ment source for purchase or operation of a farm, home, or small business. Loans will be interest free the first year and interest will not exceed 4 percent per annum. Applications for this benefit must be made to the Administrator of Veterans Affairs within 2 years after discharge by those who served in the armed forces on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of this war.

JOBS

Congress provided, in 1944, in addition to the foregoing education, farm, home, and small business opportunities, that every veteran of World War No. 2 shall be helped to find a job. The United States Employment Service and the Veterans' Placement Service Board cooperate to fill this responsibility. Veterans are to be registered and every effort made to assist them to find jobs. This provision includes veterans of all wars. Information on how to get the benefits of this provision can be obtained by the veteran from his own local United States Employment Office in his home town or county.

Return to the job after discharge is under jurisdiction of Selective Service; placing in other jobs is under War Manpower Commission; veterans' preference is administered by United States Civil Service Commission and various departments and agencies; job training, rehabilitation (nonservice disability) is administered by Federal Security Agency.

Certain preferences as to Federal civil service, as to physical and age prerequisites, examinations, ratings, appointments, retentions, and reinstatement of Federal employment, are extended to qualified service-connected disabled veterans, the wives of unemployable service-connected or 50-year-aged pensioned veterans, the widows of veterans, and other war veterans and regulars, supplemented by extensive United States Employment Service, and Veterans Employment Service, in every State, for war veterans. Any World War No. 2 veteran who applies therefor, within 40 days after discharge, is entitled to reinstatement to the Federal position held at time of entering service, or to one of equal grade and pay, or to his previous private employment, where at all practicable for employer, enforceable by order of court, if necessary.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

Congress provided in 1944 that for the first 2 years after a veteran's discharge he will be entitled to unemployment compensation for 52 weeks if he cannot find a job or the Employment Service cannot find one for him. This allowance is $20 per week, less that part of the wages payable to him for such week which is in excess of $3. Provisions for unemployment compensation, farm, home, and business ownership and education, are part of the so-called "G. I. bill of rights," one of many veterans' bills prepared in 1943–44 by the World War Veterans' Committee, of which I am a member.

In passing the G. I. bill of rights Congress has taken the first important step toward providing for returning veterans. I repeat, it is only the first step. Congress has many things yet to do in order to completely round out this all-important program. I again invite the servicemen, veterans, and their dependents to continue to write me concerning their problems. Simply address such correspondence to Congressman JOHN B. BENNETT, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

VETERANS EXPRESS APPRECIATION

Mr. Speaker, the following letter is a letter of appreciation I have received from the national legislative committee of the American Legion, approving my work for the veterans, signed by Francis M. Sullivan, executive director of the committee, and by Hon. John Stelle, chairman, American Legion special committee on rehabilitation legislation for World War No. 2 veterans. Mr. Stelle is a former Governor of the great State of Illinois. Both men have many years of experience in veterans' problems and their advice and counsel was of great value to our committee in perfecting this constructive legislation which will be so important to the veterans of this war and to the future of our country:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 20, 1944.

Hon. JOHN B. BENNETT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The American Legion is most grateful to you for the earnest, intelligent consideration and effort you have given to S. 1767, which provides Government aid for the readjustment in civilian life of returning World War No. 2 veterans.

It was gratifying to observe that the House of Representatives appreciated the work of your committee. This was reflected in the Members following the leadership of Chairman RANKIN and the committee members when the measure was up in the House for consideration.

Naturally, we of the American Legion are very proud of our part in this program. We feel when the measure becomes a law that the proper plans may be made for the day when the war will have been won and there will be mass demobilization of the present-day members of the armed forces.

We believe the privileges which will be afforded by the terms of S. 1767 to World War No. 2 veterans is a sound investment in the future of our Nation. The proposal represents an intelligent approach to the problem of readjustment in civilian life of the World War No. 2 veteran.

Again we express our appreciation for your splendid work in connection with S. 1767.

JOHN STELLE,
Chairman, Special Committee on Rehabilitation Legislation, World War No. 2 Veterans.

FRANCIS M. SULLIVAN,
Executive Director, National Legislative Committee, American Legion.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mark Sullivan from the Washington Post of Monday, August 28, 1944:

FIREWORKS IN THE W. P. B.

(By Mark Sullivan)

NELSON AND WILSON

The explosion in the War Production Board last week was sensational, and more developments will follow. But to see it as merely a clash or series of clashes, or to think of it as something within one Government department, would be superficial. The condition is wider and deeper than that. Consider just what happened.

In one of the most important administration departments, W. P. B., the No. 2 man is out. This No. 2 man, Mr. Charles E. Wilson, was powerful in the administration, as Vice Chairman of W. P. B., and also powerful in his own right—in private life he is head of the General Electric Co.

This No. 2 man is out, not because the No. 1 man wanted him out. The No. 1 man, Mr. Donald Nelson, Chairman of W. P. B., did not fire Mr. Wilson; he assured Mr. Wilson that he was fully satisfactory.

Neither is Mr. Wilson out because the President wanted him out. The President received his resignation reluctantly, and on two previous occasions when Mr. Wilson wanted to resign Mr. Roosevelt persuaded him to remain.

Why, then, is Mr. Wilson out? It is a remarkable reason. He stated it in his letter of resignation, and amplified it in even stronger words at a press conference. Mr. Wilson is out because of "attacks" upon him "inspired by subordinate officials of the board." These attacks, inspired by subordinate officials, and circulated publicly, were without the "knowledge or approval of Mr. Nelson." Yet, though the head of the W. P. B. did not approve the attacks, he was apparently unable to stop them. Mr. Wilson apprehended that "instead of being discontinued, these attacks upon me * * * will be increased." So, Mr. Wilson got out.

Here is a remarkable condition—the subordinates more powerful than the head of their own department—and more powerful than even the President, for, in getting Mr. Wilson out, they achieved a result which the President did not want, which he acutely deplored.

The condition is at once so startling and so difficult to grasp that it cannot be too much emphasized. Here is a group of men, subordinates in a Government department. They are not responsible to the public, the public has never heard their names. They are not responsible to Congress. They are responsible only to the head of their department, and above him to the President. Yet, against the wish of the head of their department and of the President, they do something which profoundly affects public policy and the conduct of public business, including conduct of the war, because the Army and Navy are dependent on W. P. B. for supplies.

To a large extent the Government has come to be operated by anonymous officials of subordinate rank. One reason is mere size, sprawling unwieldiness. In departments, more things must be done than can be done by the head of the department. And in the administration as a whole, more things must be done than any President or any man can have adequate information or sufficient time for thought to do. Heads of departments, and even more the President, must take action on the basis of reports put up to them by subordinates, sometimes accompanied by judgments suggested by the subordinates.

Some remedies are in sight. End of the war, by reducing the number of controls exercised by the Federal Government, will reduce the burdens on department heads and on the President, and reduce the number of subordinate officials. Another remedy is decentralization, preventing the Federal Government from taking over functions now exercised by the States. That Congress has this in mind is shown by its insistence that the administration of unemployment benefits for war workers shall be carried on by the States, not by the Federal Government.

Address of Hon. Joseph P. Kennedy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following able address of Hon. Joseph P. Kennedy, former United States Ambassador to Great Britain, at the annual dinner of the American Gastroenterological Association at the Drake Hotel, Chicago, Ill., Monday, June 12, 1944:

At this hour, when the country breathlessly awaits the fortunes of battle, anything we say here must, perforce, sound empty and dull. Heartened and strengthened as we are by the realization of what is transpiring, our personal views seem pitifully unimportant.

Yet, however inadequate our efforts, the one thing everyone must do for those actually engaged in the struggle, is to lend a hand when asked, to the job of getting some shape and form for the post-war world. That is the excuse I offer for presuming even at your invitation to discuss a public question at a time like this.

Our subject—post-war monetary policies—is timely and pertinent, if anything except the battle itself can be so regarded.

Concerning money matters, one of the outstanding editorial writers of our time, the late Arthur Brisbane, once wrote that not over 20 people know anything about money, and 15 of them didn't know very much.

If Mr. Brisbane's arithmetic is correct, then there are only five men alive who know much about money, and by the law of averages I am assuming that none of that five is in this audience. Thus reassured, I may safely proceed to interview myself on the subject of post-war money policies.

And I do so, speaking seriously, because I believe that the monetary policies adopted for the post-war world are a matter of very deep concern to you and to me and to every American citizen. Wars and the consequences of war are paid for by the Government bonds that you buy and the taxes that you pay. We are all very conscious of our participation in bond campaigns and I have but to remind you of that fact in urging wholehearted participation in the fifth war loan drive now starting. Regardless of what progress may be made in the solution of post-war difficulties we must all be prepared to buy more bonds and in making this investment I urge you to buy with the intention and plan of holding them to maturity and not listen to the fanciful suggestion that directly the fighting stops you cash them in and spend the money on things you have been doing without. These bonds are designed to be held to maturity and to the extent that they are not held they will constitute a continuing problem which must result in continued high taxes and perennial new issues of bonds.

We must be prepared also to continue paying taxes not only those we are directly conscious of, like taxes on our income, but the invisible taxes on every article we buy and every service we receive. This is our task.

Apart from bonds and taxes, I would like to discuss the other pertinent questions in the mind of our typical American citizen. Public opinion surveys show that after wondering when the war will end he is thinking principally about three things. First, am I going to have a job after the war? Second, will the money in which I am paid have as much purchasing power as today's dollar? And, finally, will my children have to go to war all over again?

Stated in one-word language, the average American fears unemployment, inflation, and another war.

It would be rash, under existing circumstances, for anyone to attempt a categorical answer to these questions. I have found it prudent in my own personal affairs never to attempt a forecast beyond the probabilities indicated by factors already definitely known, and I will say to you that, so far as I can see, and judging from anything anyone now knows, it can safely be said that even after several million women and children have been dropped from pay rolls, a great many of the 53,000,000 now employed must accept temporary idleness when 11,000,000 now in service are assimilated into industry.

Conferences of experts and officials will doubtless devise ways and means to find work for many, but much of the increased productive machinery created by the exigencies of war is likely to be idle.

In spite of pent-up demands to be satisfied normal business alone cannot give full employment to 65,000,000 people now in industry, on Government pay roll and in the services.

The output of our total plant capacity—which capacity enabled us to double the entire output of the Axis—is much more than the daily needs our population will require 3 to 4 years after the war. Even civilian output increased 15 percent during the war.

The volume of business we are doing today is creating a national income of $147,000,000,000.

The highest national income in peacetime history was approximately $82,000,000,000 in 1929, only to decline with unprecedented and disastrous speed to $46,000,000,000 in 1932–33—actually down to the level of 1916, the year before we entered the First World War.

In the 8 years immediately preceding 1940 it never exceeded $72,000,000,000 and not until stimulated by defense and war preparation was the 1929 peak exceeded, which occurred in 1941.

It is obvious that we must do a business in this country capable of producing an annual national income of far in excess of normal if the sixty-odd-million employees are to have jobs. No one can now assure you business will be good continuously. Indeed no one can be sure how much business will drop from today's $147,000,000,000 during the 5 or 6 years following the war's conclusion. We saw it drop 44 percent in 3 years following the 1929 splurge.

Incidentally, if business were to drop to what was boom proportions in 1929 ($82,000,000,000) it would mean depression today.

I see nothing to be gained by encouraging baseless hopes. I know that pledges are being given that employment shall be provided for everybody and maybe the yearners and planners who retail that kind of optimism know how it can be done. It clearly cannot be done by the Government at the expense of the people through unlimited expansion of public debt. Our debt is now $196,000,000,000 and on the completion of this drive just started it will be well in excess of $210,000,000,000. Conservatively it is being forecast to land somewhere between $250,000,000,000 and $300,000,000,000 before the war ends and, in fact, Congress on May 31 last expanded the legal debt limit to $260,000,000,000. Frankly, I cannot comprehend the implications of such staggering totals. I know what a million dollars is and what it means and even what it takes to get it, but frankly I am lost in awe when that yardstick is multiplied by thousands.

I know all the spurious generalities and the loose talk that is indulged in about debt. "The size of the national debt," one of these planners recently said, "is of no consequence. After all, we just owe it to ourselves." I gave up trying to understand that one, except that I know perfectly well that when Government bonds are outstanding in anyone's hands, American citizens or foreigners, a debt and an interest charge has been created which must be met. You, as a taxpayer, must furnish the means with which your Government meets its obligations. The transfer of funds creates less friction when distributed at home instead of abroad, but in no other way does the fact that the national debt is owned by American citizens reduce the burden.

Furthermore, no government can guarantee full employment if such must depend upon unlimited expansion of the public debt.

Experience everywhere has shown that even industrialized nations cannot long endure an annual fixed charge in excess of 25 percent of national income. The total budgetary expenditure of this country with $250,000,000,000 net debt, and exclusive of debt retirement but including care of veterans we are fortunate enough to welcome home, will exceed $23,000,000,000, a sum which is almost 30 percent of any national income enjoyed in any but war-stimulated years.

Sensibly we must conclude, therefore, that there is no promise under normal peacetime conditions of a balanced budget and a national income safely permitting the Government to find work for all the 30,000,000 people whom former President Hoover, for instance, predicts must be demobilized from the war effort.

This debt and service burden is a contributing factor to the answer to our second question, namely, for those of us who will have work in the post-war world, what will the money with which our wages are paid be worth? And here you will say I am raising up the ugly head of inflation. Unfortunately for those who would enjoy what is called "a free ride" and "a silk-shirt boom" such as followed 1918, I am frankly, with what knowledge I possess and with the facts and statistics that are available, unable to persuade myself that inflation is as real a danger as deflation. I appreciate that there is a tremendous purchasing power demand for goods that are now under Government quota control and that once those controls are lifted the would-be purchasers have at hand the effective means of paying for what they want in the shape of enormous savings.

I would remind you, however, first, we are officially told that Government controls are not going to be abandoned on most of the manufactured articles going into civilian consumption and, second, that no one knows what the frame of mind of the public will be, which during the progress of war with swollen war wages has seen fit to put so large a percentage of their earnings into savings and into Government bonds. I am familiar with the spending spree that followed the First World War, but the attitude of mind which caused the individual civilian to spend his money recklessly then was generated by factors not in the present situation. For one thing, bank deposits doubled in 2 years. Of the $100,000,000,000 estimated liquid assets in the hands of the public today, bank deposits are only 25 percent larger than a few years ago. European currency fluctuations scared our people into spending 25 years ago, whereas today steps are being taken as indicated by the forthcoming Bretton Woods Monetary Conference to forestall such possibilities.

Finally, we must recognize the fact that after 5 years of defense and war production, supplies of many raw materials actually exist in surplus creating a problem of distribution, and some agricultural items now seem to be unnecessarily rationed.

In answer to the question of what kind of commodity dollar are we going to have after the war, I say with some confidence that it will buy for you just as many of the necessities of life as it does today, because I fully expect that Governmenta controls and priorities are not going to be abandoned for some time.

I take it for granted also that our currency dollar is going to be good, that the gold content of the dollar and its value in foreign exchange is not going to be changed. The traditional American policy is for stabilized currency. That was true, for instance, in 1862 when Abraham Lincoln in his second message to Congress said, "Fluctuations in value of currency are always injurious and to reduce these fluctuations to the lowest possible point will always be a leading purpose in wise legislation."

It was true on July 1, 1933, when President Franklin Roosevelt said that he planned to establish a dollar that would have the same purchasing power from generation to generation.

I take it that inflation is no part of anybody's agenda.

If it is, then there is no way of answering the third question, namely, what really are the prospects for a holiday from war.

What part are we to play in stabilizing international conditions? Our stake therein is great and it will undoubtedly be very much to our own interests that much of the aid we give Europe after the war shall be without any idea of repayment. It will be what President Roosevelt called, last week, an investment in peace. Such contribution, however, cannot be unlimited; because, strange as it may seem to say it, our resources are not unlimited. The contribution must remain within our means. And above all, the people, on whom the cost will fall, must be convinced that gifts made possible by their sacrifice are being used wisely. Otherwise there will be disillusionment, repulsion of sentiment and withdrawal of future cooperation.

People will watch for each sign in Europe and in Asia, of vigorous and courageous grappling with reconstruction; they will watch jealously the efforts made on currency stabilization, and if their funds are to be used, as the New York Times stated, "to support the currencies of China, Ethiopia and Iraq," and thereby "to support the internal economic policies of those countries," they are going to ask how long these burdens can be afforded by this country and why the same results cannot be attained by sound currency policies within each nation.

If we remember that no peace is durable which cannot be endured, if we remember Prime Minister Churchill's obligation on the part of the leading allies "to keep within certain minimum standards of armaments for the purpose of maintaining peace" we will get some idea of why sound economic conditions are essential prerequisites of any formula for preventing war; for we cannot do even the minimum that Mr. Churchill suggests if we are not economically sound.

No one can present a pattern for peaceful living, but it is absolutely essential that the principal Allied Nations must first settle their domestic problems, balance their budgets, and strengthen their economic positions at home so that they may be free to assume a full share in the responsibility of establishing and maintaining peace for the world. I have no completed program to suggest, for it is much too early to be rigid about such things.

I recently said in a public address that "Blueprints, but not contracts, should be in the brief cases of those who will meet in the conferences of peace. The contracts can be let after the designs have been carefully inspected for fundamental errors that can be corrected on the blueprint but not in a finished structure."

I think we on our part can do that best by restoring as fully as possible the American way of living and, as I also said in Boston a few weeks ago, leaving to the other fellow the talk about expansion of foreign trade. Not of course "discontinuing the traditional American system of trading with the rest of the world subject to some tariff limitations."

And American labor must also be protected by the maintenance of immigration quotas.

It is essential to European countries that they live by foreign trade and we may as well recognize the fact that the bottleneck in foreign trade is our unwillingness to buy—not our ability to sell. Unless we give other nations an opportunity to acquire dollars, unless we are willing to take goods and services of others to the extent that we want them to take our goods and services, we are going to deprive them of an opportunity to make the living which we have sacrificed countless lives and spent billions to obtain for them.

Frankly, I can see vast business abroad during the period of necessary reconstruction and rehabilitation, until those immediate needs are satisfied. India and China, for instance, because of their teeming millions, are heralded as a source of foreign trade for us. Briefly, the prospect of huge exports to these countries during our lifetime seems remote. Irrigation, housing, road construction, of course—but it will be many years before the standard of living in those countries will improve enough to create a demand for our essential products. Let me remind you that the total of our exports for the last seven years before this war averaged $3,000,000,000 annually. We send twice as much as that out of our ports in war materials now every month. We cannot possibly expect under normal conditions demand sufficient to guarantee substantial foreign trade. We know perfectly well that if lend-lease isn't to continue indefinitely, foreign countries cannot afford to pay us for exports.

So that in answering the query, "What are the prospects of an enduring peace?" I say to you that unless conditions after the war are such that the smaller nations of the world are not subject to the ruinous economic struggle for foreign trade, which could only be the prelude to chaos and political upheaval abroad fomenting the seeds of war, no peace prospect is durable because no such peace would be endurable.

At home we must move surely and swiftly to see to it that capital, labor, and Government, separately and collectively, assume their obvious responsibilities in the post-war world.

I am confident that under Government leadership a workable program can be developed.

I hold no brief for the view that private capital exclusively exhibits virtues of conduct. I am sure that Government control can become irritating interference and I can see no sense in he labor policy that leads workmen to go on strike when a factory is faced with the inevitable discontinuance of war contracts such as occurred at the Brewster plant 2 weeks ago. How that procedure could help either the workmen themselves, labor, or the owners of the business, capital, or the Government of the Nation is another one of those things I am too dull to comprehend.

I think it is absolutely necessary immediately that businessmen recognize that no useful purpose could be served if all controls were to be lifted; that the Government recognize immediately that complete control amounting to interference with American business enterprises is absolutely destructive of the initiative which is the hallmark of our economy and that labor recognize immediately that, in the enormous work of industrial demobilization that lies ahead, it must assume some share of responsibility and that dislocation and relocation of workers is inevitable.

There is nothing more certain, and in this I have no hesistancy to assume the role of prophet, than that if we wish to avoid unemployment and if we wish to make the dollar paid for labor's wage valuable, capital, labor, and Government must sit down together and do some pretty solid constructive thinking. And they had better begin thinking pretty soon because cut-backs and cancelations are inevitable—because the invasion which has started marks the beginning of the end of our wartime economy. Demobilization of industries, adjustment of productive capacities to normal conditions or to peacetime conditions is not going to be done easily at best—it is going to be stymied if capital, labor, and Government are at loggerheads.

In the adjustment from war to peace conditions our citizens too have an important role. They should develop the maximum of capacity for understanding and assuming their responsibilities. If they know enough about what is going on, and if they understand it, they have the power to exercise sufficient control over private initiative, Government and labor alike, to make certain that the problems facing us are not only solved in the common interest but are placed in the charge of the best people available, irrespective of social status or party affiliations.

Similarly, in the international field, cooperation is essential. We will have crisis after crisis leading up to a third world war, if we do not, in accord with the other great powers like Britain and Russia, try to understand the problems of the smaller states. There is in the world everywhere today a very strong consciousness among the people of their nationhood. Today, after the scourge of German or Japanese or even Italian fascism, the victims have one fundamental desire, merely that of being left alone. They do not wish to be bossed, even by their friends and liberators, and any attempt on our part to tell these nations what they are to do, or any scheme of making such economic help as we may be able to give them conditional on their obeying, would only antagonize them and promote further discontent in the world. If we wish to exchange not only goods and services but also ideas, inventions, and other matters of the spirit and the mind with these nations, most of which are old civilizations, we must not approach them in a spirit of aloofness, but rather as friends and partners in the most stupendous undertaking the world has ever seen.

To summarize: I do believe that in the post-war world most of our people who want to work will have a job. But common sense tells me that with the slow tempo of peace, following the fulfillment of temporary pent-up demands, it is not going to be possible to give continuous full-time employment to 65,000,000 people now on private or public pay rolls. I am not afraid that the laborer's wage dollar will be made valueless by ruinous inflation. I do believe that an enduring peace is possible if ruinous economic competition does not make small nations forget and larger nations ignore their international responsibilities—to live and let live.

I am confident a way will be found to maintain a decent post-war world; to make America strong and to keep it strong, thereby best serving the world. As Congresswoman Luce so aptly said, "There are no hopeless situations—only hopeless men." I am far from hopeless—I merely wish to be prepared.

Through the efforts of government, business, and labor we can avoid depression; but not if we allow things to take their course. The Government will have to encourage in every possible way an increase in the volume of national production, usually referred to as national income, and to the free marketing of an expanded production and these matters should receive attention before some of the desirable, but not urgent, social objectives. Government, for instance, while tiding over those who cannot immediately find jobs must create some jobs itself in public works, housing operations, and particularly by liberal financing of home buying.

Business associations, in turn, can devise methods of employment and labor, by agreeing to remove building restrictions, can greatly accelerate expansion.

Self-reliant as the American people are, they will match with their savings any efforts made in their behalf; and as a consequence of these mutual efforts of government, business, labor, and the people themselves, we protect and maintain the American standard of living.

Five years ago I was opposed to having a nation that was then unprepared, rushed headlong into a war which it would be asked both to fight and finance. I now urge with all the strength I command that America keep strong industrially and financially, and that we be not compelled by those who have the power to bind us to bear an onerous share of the expenses of world-wide social service, foreign trade, and world currencies.

I have no objection to our share of the social bill necessary to promote tranquillity and world-wide decent existence for all who merit it by cooperation. I have no patience with the view that, because our cities have not been devastated and gutted as I saw London scourged that therefore we have not suffered from this war. You can't tell that to the family whose boy is not coming home at the end of the war.

I am happy that we have been allowed to enjoy intact so many of the things that we consider our heritage and our daily needs. I think it would be cowardly to shrink from participation in the problem of straightening out this world wreckage. But it would be stupid in our generosity to forget ourselves. Help the rest of the world by all means—but don't commit America to endless burdens. Preserve internationalism but serve America. Out of all of this terrible turmoil some one nation should emerge strong enough to stand as a beacon of hope to the world.

Let America be that shining beacon.

But let us now agree on the message its flashes will send forth. And let us be certain that no man chosen to serve our people shall alter one word or letter in that message, which I hope will be:

"No inflation, either direct or by repudiating our bond. No deflation achieved through ruthless unemployment. Stabilization at home and all help to those abroad who do the same—but to those only."

This is the economic path to peace. No peace ever reached its goal, with strength to hold it, over any other path.

The Patriotism of Italian Americans—Hundreds of Thousands Contribute Small Sums in Fifth War Loan Drive To Help Insure Victory

REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, the conclusion of the Fifth War Loan drive has shown some very interesting facts relating to the people of Italian origin in the United States.

This drive, which was a part of the general War Loan drive, was intended to reach every man, woman, and child of Italian origin residing in the State of New York. The State of New York is particularly mentioned since it contains within its borders a larger proportion of people of Italian origin than any State in the Union.

Many years ago it has been said facetiously that the city of New York contained more Italians than the city of Rome or Naples or any other fair-sized city of the Italian Peninsula. In fact, there was a current story that when Thomas Nelson Page, who was a native New Yorker, was appointed by President Wilson to represent the United States as our Ambassador to Italy, he said that he found the position very congenial, since in his own life he had met so many Italians in the city of New York that coming to Rome was like coming home.

This year, 1944, stands out also as the year in which fine progress was made by our armed forces in the Italian campaign and in which the American Army administration in occupied Italian territory is full of praise for the splendid cooperation it received from the people of Italy.

After the nightmare of fascism has been removed and the destruction of all that fascism stood for has been achieved by the people of Italy themselves, we found not only a defeated enemy, but what is more important, a loyal and cooperative friend.

For 22 years the people of that unhappy country suffered from the exaggerated pretensions of an upstart who tried to bully and dominate not only his own nation, but the world. Long before Hitler started on his career of conquest, Mussolini likewise tried to convert a law-abiding and sweet population into a nation of bullies and cutthroats.

It is to the eternal honor of the Italian people that after suffering from the tyrannical domination of this unhappy product of the last World War, they were finally able to rid themselves of the monster and resume their proper places in the family of nations.

The nation of Dante, of Petrarch, Tasso, and Verdi, came to know the measure of Mussolini and find him as utterly unfit to represent it as the many other tyrants who grew up in Europe in the era between the two World Wars.

Among the people of the United States, it was the people of Italian origin who forever were in the ranks of our honest and law-abiding citizens. They have reached distinction in many fields, particularly in the field of arts for which their natural genius so plentifully endows them. It would be unthinkable to find a more gifted race in the field of music, poetry, painting, sculpture, and many other products of human genius than you find among the people of Italian origin. In this country there is no greater symphony orchestra than that conducted by Arturo Toscanini, who is himself a refugee from the terror of fascism. The list of their great names could be multiplied indefinitely. We owe a deep debt of gratitude to the contribution made by such fine artists to the collective stream of American culture.

I do not wish, however, to expatiate on the artistic phase of Italy's contribution to American civilization. I wish to stress at this time the continued loyalty of its sons and daughters to the cause of democracy, a loyalty which was stilted and stifled during the years of Mussolini's ascendancy. Those years are a nightmare which we all wish to forget, and while it was 22 years of misery, nevertheless we hope there will be no recurrence of any such Caesarism in sunny Italy.

If I may digress for a moment, in the story of nations there comes a time when tyrants seize power and when the voice of the people is stilled. But, invariably a resurrection takes place and I know that, in God's scheme of things, it is not given that tyranny retain its control over the lives of the people.

The Fifth War Loan drive was another instance of a spontaneous response by the average man, woman, and child to the call of his country for loyal contributions to make victory secure. It was in this spirit that the Committee for Americans of Italian Origin of the State of New York set itself the goal of disposing of a large amount of bonds. We now have their report. It shows that $70,000,000 worth of bonds were sold during this drive to 836,715 individuals. This indicates again how many small contributions go to make up a large sum like $70,000,000.

At the present time when billions are the order of the day and when our national expenditures are measured by billions of dollars, $70,000,000 may not look like a very large sum, but if one considers that in order to arrive at this figure it was necessary to obtain contributions from 836,715 individuals, it is clear that this is no mean effort and no mean achievement.

I have before me the report divided into cities, counties, villages, and hamlets of the State of New York. There are in this list names of individuals who humbly purchased but $25 bonds, as well as others who have become purchasers of bonds of $500 or $1,000 or even more, but all these contributions of the people of Italian origin of the State of New York are in comparatively small amounts.

The intention of the committee was not to reach the wealthy who could purchase their own securities through their banks or their brokers. It was the humble purchaser of the $25 bond who was particularly dear to the committee, since such an individual would usually stint himself to buy a bond and would not buy a bond for investment. As in the former War Loan drives, many of these humble contributors did not wish to invest money in War bonds as a means of savings. They wish to give to the Government and while it is the intention of the Government to repay for such loan with interest, it is not the desire of these people to see their money returned to them, which animates these humble purchasers, but on the contrary should they be permitted to make outright gifts to the Government, they would feel proud and happy to do so.

I have encountered many men in my own constituency who have urged me to accept small gifts for the Government to prosecute the war and who were rather disappointed that they were obliged to buy bonds which the Government would repay with interest rather than accept their contributions in cash. The prevailing spirit of these persons, however, is the spirit of sacrifice, the spirit of giving and not lending, the spirit of sharing and not demanding, the spirit of sacrifice and not selfishness, the spirit of devotion and not egoism.

In this list, which I consider an honor roll of the Italian people, we will find the names of men and women who make no claim to fame or importance, whose names will not be emblazoned on monuments and public buildings, but simple men, simple women, the sons and daughters of an honorable race and true and loyal citizens of the United States.

The Fifth War Loan drive of the Committee for Americans of Italian Origin in the State of New York, was conducted by Gene Pope, who was the chairmar of the drive and of whose patriotism there can be no question and whose success was only rivaled by previous successes which I had occasion to comment upon on the floor of the House. He has done a splendid job, in a self-sacrificing manner and deserves the thanks of all of our citizens.

Governor Dewey and the Soldiers' Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, informed citizens of New York State must be vastly puzzled with Governor Dewey's boastful embrace of his soldiers' vote law. His rejection of the Federal ballot can hardly call for the self-satisfaction he displays. When asserting that New York State leads others in percentages of war applications received, Governor Dewey omits the fact that in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Connecticut, which do not require application, almost 100 percent of the voters in service have already received their ballots. He makes no mention of the disenfranchised merchant marine New Yorkers or those serving abroad in the U. S. O. and Red Cross.

The following editorial, which appeared in today's New York Times, is an apt summary of the entangled New York State soldiers' vote law:

THE SOLDIER'S BALLOT

The State war ballot commission reports that applications for ballots have been received thus far from some 400,000 members of the armed forces who are residents of New York, and Governor Dewey hails this as proof that the State has taken adequate steps to "safeguard for its men and women in uniform their constitutional right to a full ballot." We hope that the Governor's confidence is justified. But it is certainly premature, and it certainly does not give the vote to members of the merchant marine or Red Cross workers.

It is premature because these are only applications and because, under the State law, a good many things must happen before an application becomes a ballot. The State's regulations set September 7 as the date when the first ballots will be mailed to those who have applied for them. All ballots must be returned by November 3 if they are to be counted. This leaves a period of just 57 days in which ballots mailed from Albany must catch up with soldiers and sailors who will in many thousands of cases have been moved to entirely new stations in the meantime, and for these soldiers and sailors to return their ballots to the State war ballot commission, the war ballot commission to send them to the counties, and the counties to send them to the assembly districts and the electoral districts.

It was the virtue of the Federal ballot, which Governor Dewey has held to be unconstitutional in New York, that it did at least provide a short ballot, distributed on the spot, to those whose full State ballots went astray. Obviously the chance of ballots going astray increases in direct proportion to the nearness of the soldier and sailor to the actual fighting fronts. Under the State law, those who are taking the greatest risks have the smallest chance of voting.

No critic of the State law ever contended that it did not make adequate provision for applying for ballots. The question has been whether it makes adequate provision for voting. And here the proof of the pudding must be in the eating. The only valid basis on which to pronounce the State law a success, if it is a success, is on the results achieved on November 7.

G. I. Bill of Rights—Questions and Answers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I, at the request of several of my colleagues, am inserting in the Appendix of the RECORD a discussion of the G. I. bill of rights:

The ANNOUNCER. Iowa Legionnaires are fortunate in having at the microphone this morning the Honorable PAUL CUNNINGHAM, Congressman from the Fifth District of Iowa, to give us some of the salient facts about the G. I. bill of rights. Certainly, no one is better equipped or more fully informed on this important legislation than Congressman CUNNINGHAM, who, as a member of the conferees of Congress, which prepared the bill, was very active in the drafting of the bill, and who, as a committee member of the Veterans' Committee of the House of Representatives, has the veterans' welfare at heart. It is a pleasure to present our own Iowa Legionnaire, a member of Baldwin-Patterson Post, of Des Moines, the Honorable PAUL CUNNINGHAM.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Good morning, friends. Thousands of discharged service men and women of this war are writing the Veterans' Administration in Washington about opportunities offered them under the American Legion's G. I. bill of rights, which was signed as Public Law, 346, on June 22.

Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, said that in the first month after the bill was signed his office had received more than 4,000 letters of general inquiry. In addition, there have been more than 1,000 applications for educational benefits provided under title II of the new law, to veterans who want to resume their schooling.

As a result of the widespread interest among veterans concerning educational and vocational training benefits granted under the new law, application forms for those who seek to take advantage of these benefits have been distributed to the Veterans' Administration's 51 field stations.

With such intensive, Nation-wide interest in this educational program for our veterans, both men and women, it is my thought that perhaps we can use this broadcast period so generously donated to the American Legion by radio station WHO, in a sort of question and answer session which may clarify many items or benefits in the program.

First, any veteran who served 90 days or more, and who had not passed his twenty-fifth birthday at the time of entry into service, is automatically eligible to educational or vocational training benefits, even though he was not in school when he enlisted or was inducted.

Veterans who had passed their twenty-fifth birthdays fall in two classes:

No. 1. In this first group are those who had finished their education or vocational training and who desire a refresher or retraining course in order to brush up on their work, but for a period of 1 year only.

No. 2. In this second group are those who can prove that their education or vocational training was interrupted by entry into service, and are, therefore, entitled to as much as 4 years of schooling.

In all cases, however, the veteran must show 90 days or more service, unless he was discharged for disability incurred in line of duty.

The veteran is free to attend any school or training institution he desires, provided that he can measure up to its general scholastic standards. For instance, if a college or university requires certain high school credits, the veteran must be able to show that he possesses them if he wishes to enter that school.

If a veteran should be rejected by a school because of scholastic credit requirements, there is nothing to prevent him from entering some other school to which his high school or college credits are acceptable.

The Government will then pay tuition and fees up to $500 a year, plus $50 a month subsistence for single men or $75 for those who have wives or other dependents.

I am glad to report that veterans eligible for educational benefits are automatically entitled to 1 year of schooling. How much additional schooling they get is determined by the length of their active service in the armed forces, but in no case may the total exceed 4 years.

Servicemen who participated in the Army Specialized Training Program or the Navy College Training Program are not entitled to educational benefits if either of these programs enabled them to complete a course of study which they had started before entering service.

However, if a man were studying architecture when he entered service, and he was then required to take an engineering course under either program, he would be eligible after discharge to complete his architectural training under the educational benefits section of the G. I. bill.

But let's take a look at a set of very pertinent questions which were prepared by the American Legion. Perhaps we can answer most of these and thereby assist the veteran in a better understanding of the G. I. bill of rights while complete regulations are being drawn by the Veterans' Administration.

Here's what the Legion's G. I. bill of rights does for service men and women.

Question. Is any veteran eligible to the benefits provided by the G. I. bill?

Answer. No. Only those veterans who served 90 days or more after September 16, 1940, and who were discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, are eligible.

Question. What if a man is wounded or disabled before he has served 90 days?

Answer. The 90-day restriction does not apply if he was discharged for disability incurred in line of duty.

Question. Does the time spent in school under the Army Specialized Training Program or the Navy College Training Program count as active service under the Legion's G. I. bill?

Answer. Not if the veteran completed a course of study which he had begun in civil life before entering service.

Question. If I was under 25 years old when I entered service, am I eligible to return to college and finish my course in medicine?

Answer. So long as you had not passed your twenty-fifth birthday when you entered service, you are automatically eligible to all of the educational benefits of the G. I. bill.

Question. I have a friend who was over 25 and was just starting to practice law when he entered service; now he feels that he has to brush up on his law because he was away from it so long. Is he eligible for aid?

Answer. If a man was over 25 when entering service, he has two opportunities: (1) He is automatically eligible for a 1-year refresher or retraining course; (2) he can get the same educational benefits as other men by proving that his education was interrupted by entry into service.

Question. Are nurses, WAVES, WAC's, SPARS, and Marine Women Reservists eligible for benefits under the G. I. bill?

Answer. They are, and on the same terms as men.

Question. Where can a veteran apply for aid under the G. I. bill?

Answer. He may consult the service officer of any American Legion post or ask the manager or contact representative of any of the branches of the Veterans' Administration.

Question. If I want to enter my State university, what can I do?

Answer. Go to the registrar with your honorable discharge and your high-school and other credits. He will tell you whether you are qualified to enter and will show you what forms to fill out for submission to the Veterans' Administration.

Question. Do I have to wait until the Veterans' Administration acts before I can enter school?

Answer. The rules and regulations are now being drawn, but the plan is to have the school certify you as a student eligible to veterans' benefits so that you can enroll at once.

Question. How much will the Government pay toward the cost of my schooling?

Answer. Up to $500 a year in tuition, fees, and similar costs.

Question. Will I receive anything to support myself?

Answer. Yes; $50 a month if you are single and $75 if you have a wife or other dependents.

Question. How long may I remain in school?

Answer. If you were under 25 when you entered service, you will receive 1 year of schooling for your first 90 days of qualifying service, plus a period equal to the time you spent in active service over 90 days.

Question. If I am out of a job, what do I do?

Answer. Go to your American Legion service officer and also register for work with the United States Employment Service, which will ask you to report regularly.

Question. Will I get any money while I am waiting for a job?

Answer. Yes. You will be paid $20 a week for unemployment which begins after the first Sunday in September 1944.

Question. How long will this last?

Answer. It can last as long as 52 weeks.

Question. Do all veterans get that much?

Answer. No. Less than 90 days, no entitlement, but a man who served 90 days receives 8 weeks of benefits for each month of active service, or 24 weeks.

Question. If a man served more than 90 days, how much would he be paid?

Answer. He would be eligible for 24 weeks of benefits for his first 90 days and 4 additional weeks for each month of active service above 90 days, but in no case may he draw benefits for more than 52 weeks.

Question. If a man finds work while he is drawing benefits, what happens?

Answer. The benefits stop.

Question. If he should lose his job after a short time, but has not used all of the benefits due him, what happens?

Answer. He may again draw benefits for the number of weeks remaining to his credit.

Question. How does the Employment Service help a man find a job?

Answer. It keeps a list of jobs and will refer veterans to employers for employment.

Question. Suppose I lose my job because of a strike?

Answer. If you have not participated in the strike, you may still draw benefits.

Question. Do I have to accept a job in a place where there is a strike?

Answer. You do not.

Question. Do I have to take any job that is offered in order to be eligible for help?

Answer. You do if the job is in line with your ability and talent.

Question. Some jobs do not pay what they ought to.

Answer. If the salary, hours, and working conditions of the job that is offered to you are not up to the standards of similar jobs in your home area, you do not have to accept it, and you may still draw the unemployment benefits.

Question. If I want to learn a trade instead of going to school, may I do that?

Answer. Yes. The Veterans' Administration is making up a list of private employers who will provide veterans with the opportunity to learn a trade which they are suited to teach.

Question. Could I learn to be a machinist?

Answer. Provision is made so that you can learn to be a machinist, foundryman, printer, engraver, barber, automobile mechanic, farmer, or any other occupation you choose.

Question. If I want to borrow money to buy or build a home, how do I go about it?

Answer. Go to your own bank or building and loan association.

Question. Won't the Government lend me anything directly?

Answer. No. The Government merely insures or endorses half of the amount of your loan.

Question. How much can I get this way?

Answer. That "half" may amount to as much as $2,000, so that most men with reasonable credit and earning power will be able to get $4,000.

Question. I have a friend who wants to buy a $10,000 house; what will he do?

Answer. If he has good credit and prospects of a good income, the Veterans' Administration will insure $2,000 of the amount and the Federal Housing Administration or other agency will insure the balance.

Question. Then some veterans can buy a $10,000 house without any cash outlay of their own?

Answer. That is correct.

Question. Why was this arrangement made?

Answer. Because many men with good earning power have been in service a long time, and their savings have been used during their absence in the armed forces.

Question. May I borrow money to buy a farm or set myself up in business?

Answer. Yes; you may borrow money under this plan for any business which you are qualified to operate. You also may borrow money to repair your house, pay taxes, and to buy farm machinery, equipment, and livestock.

Question. Then I could build or buy a filling station, garage, barber shop, drugstore, hardware store, meat market, or grocery?

Answer. You could.

Question. How long will I have to repay my loan?

Answer. As long as 20 years, depending on how much you borrow and for what purpose.

Question. If I should become sick or get hurt after I am out of service, will the Veterans' Administration help me?

Answer. As a veteran who fought for his country, you can get the best treatment that money will buy at the veterans' hospital closest to your home, or the one best suited to handle your case. Men and women with service-connected disabilities will be hospitalized. Non-service-connected cases will be hospitalized according to the availability of beds.

Question. Will I have to pay for this care?

Answer. Not if you sign a statement you are unable to pay the cost of hospitalization and treatment.

Question. If there is reason to believe that my trouble is the result of service, what do I do?

Answer. Call for a representative of the Veterans' Administration or an American Legion service officer, and he will help you prepare a claim.

Question. If I become totally and permanently disabled from a cause not due to service, am I eligible for a pension?

Answer. Yes; subject to certain service requirements and an income limitation.

Question. If I am not a Legion member, may I ask for help from a Legion service officer?

Answer. The American Legion helps all veterans.

Extract From Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following extract from chapter III, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, by Edward Gibbon, 1737–94:

Before an assembly thus modeled and prepared, Augustus pronounced a studied oration, which displayed his patriotism, and disguised his ambition. "He lamented, yet excused, his past conduct. Filial piety had required at his hands the revenge of his father's murder; the humanity of his own nature had sometimes given way to the stern laws of necessity, and to a forced connection with two unworthy colleagues: as long as Antony lived, the republic forbade him to abandon her to a degenerate Roman, and a barbarian queen. He was now at liberty to satisfy his duty and his inclination. He solemnly restored the senate and people to all their ancient rights; and wished only to mingle with the crowd of his fellow citizens, and to share the blessings which he had obtained for his country."

It would require the pen of Tacitus (if Tacitus had assisted at this assembly) to describe the various emotions of the senate; those that were suppressed, and those that were affected. It was dangerous to trust the sincerity of Augustus; to seem to distrust it was still more dangerous. The respective advantages of monarchy and a republic have often divided speculative inquirers; the present greatness of the Roman state, the corruption of manners, and the licence of the soldiers, supplied new arguments to the advocates of monarchy; and these general views of government were again warped by the hopes and fears of each individual. Amidst this confusion of sentiments, the answer of the senate was unanimous and decisive. They refused to accept the resignation of Augustus; they conjured him not to desert the republic, which he had saved. After a decent resistance, the crafty tyrant submitted to the orders of the senate; and consented to receive the government of the provinces, and the general command of the Roman armies, under the well-known names of Proconsul and Imperator. But he would receive them only for 10 years. Even before the expiration of that period, he hoped that the wounds of civil discord would be completely healed, and that the republic, restored to its pristine health and vigor, would no longer require the dangerous interposition of so extraordinary a magistrate. The memory of this comedy, repeated several times during the life of Augustus, was preserved to the last ages of the empire, by the peculiar pomp with which the perpetual monarchs of Rome always solemnized the tenth years of their reign.

Sidney Hillman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the sound and the fury accompanying the activities of the Political Action Committee leaves one with the distinct impression of a conspiratorial clamoring. Charges range from racket to regimentation. Sidney Hillman has been called foreigner, the implication being that the place of his birth made him a suspicious character per se. Communist is hurled at him almost daily, though an examination of the record of his political behavior throughout the years, would definitely dispel any such notion. Why all the noise?

The objectives of the P. A. C. have been left out of the maligning campaign. Their very reasonableness does not make good copy for those who would exaggerate the P. A. C. into a crushing monster seeking to destroy the American way of life. P. A. C. proposes:

First. To place the election issues before the people.

Second. To urge people to register and vote.

Third. To supply voters with a list of the candidates and to solicit their support for those favorable to the organization's program.

There can be no quarrel with the desirability of educating the electorate to make use of the fundamental instrument of democracy, the ballot. To be vote conscious is a step forward in the working of our form of government. Nor can there be any question of the desirability for each voter to have a knowledge of and interest in the election issues. That the P. A. C. urges the election of Roosevelt and TRUMAN and such others as they name is no crime, any more than it is criminal for the National Association of Manufacturers to make known its preferences.

More hue and cry have been raised over the $1 contributions to the P. A. C. than the thousands contributed to the Republican campaign funds of 1940 by a single contributor. Is the $1 contribution of John Doe, welder, more inimicable to the interests of the country than the $10,000 contribution of a du Pont?

When Dewey received the $5,000 contribution in 1937 from the C. I. O., to be exact, from Hillman's union, I do not recall his rejecting it. In fact, his campaign manager asked for more.

Throughout the history of our Nation, organizations of all kinds have concerned themselves with political activity, endorsing, supporting with funds or work, some candidate or other. That is as it should be. The P. A. C. has shown no reluctance to reveal the intent, scope, and finance of the organization. Such openness is not the markings of a body sinister. Nor has the organization millions at its disposal, not even one million, contrary to those who are working so diligently to paint the P. A. C. as an overwhelming menace.

In his testimony before the House Committee on Campaign Expenditures, Mr. Hillman stated, "Our committee is a nonpartisan organization. Our purpose is to assist in welding the unity of workers, farmers, and all other progressives on the basis of a constructive and forward-looking program, and in support of candidates, irrespective of their party labels, who support that program."

The P. A. C.'s support of Roosevelt and Truman has no doubt been responsible for the fury of the attack upon it. That explains a great deal, does it not?

Increase in Number of Federal Employees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, according to an article, Taxation After the War, by Harley L. Lutz in the July 1944 issue of the Controller, giving a succinct presentation of the increase in the number of Federal employees, as of May 1943 the Federal employees outnumbered all State and local employees in the following States:

State	Number of employees
	Federal	State and local
Alabama	64,500	45,700
Arizona	16,400	11,800
California	239,600	218,500
Florida	59,500	41,000
Georgia	73,100	55,300
Maine	29,200	26,600
Maryland	62,100	33,300
Massachusetts	129,700	127,800
Nevada	5,700	3,800
New Jersey	98,500	97,100
New Mexico	17,600	12,600
Pennsylvania	212,500	200,800
Rhode Island	22,100	19,500
South Carolina	53,000	35,200
Texas	149,400	124,300
Utah	38,400	17,000
Virginia	119,700	57,200
Washington	85,200	50,800
Total, above States	1,479,500	1,191,100
Total all States (exclusive of District of Columbia)	2,810,800	3,053,800

Special communications from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, dated Feb. 2, 1944.

Mr. Speaker, and thus it has come to pass, as it was written by Thomas Jefferson in his classic indictment of George III:

He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people, and eat out their substance.

Amendment To Apply Proceeds From Surplus Property Sales To Reduce National Debt Will Work in Reverse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me, I am including in my remarks copy of an editorial that appeared in the Washington Post this morning concerning the Herter amendment to the surplus property bill, which would require all moneys derived from the sale of surplus property to be applied to the reduction of the national debt.

At the time this amendment was pending I stated that it was not workable. The Treasury must raise money to meet its expenditures, which requires the issuing of bonds and short-term loans. As everyone knows, the interest paid on Government bonds issued in recent years is extremely low. After the war it will be necessary, at least during the reconversion period, to borrow money. If bonds are issued, the Treasury will run into difficulties in trying to dispose of them unless there is a higher rate of interest than has been paid in recent years. The editorial follows:

TREASURY PROTEST

The Senate hastily inserted an amendment into the surplus property bill prior to its passage providing that the proceeds of sales should be used exclusively for reduction of the public debt. In offering the amendment Senator WHERRY quoted approvingly the Baruch report to the effect that all the war surpluses have been paid for by the American public, either through taxes or by an increase in the national debt. Hence the proceeds of all sales of surpluses, it was concluded, should go to reduce the debt and lower post-war taxes. The Baruch report added that "no agency should be permitted to sell surpluses and use the proceeds for other purposes."

We venture to say that Mr. Baruch would be greatly surprised to learn of this use of his remarks. To have them cited as an argument in favor of putting all receipts from sales of surplus property into a special fund to be used exclusively to retire debt while deficit financing is continuing. The purport of the statement in the Baruch report, of course, is quite clear; it was intended to drive home the importance of utilizing the proceeds of sales to relieve the demands on the public, instead of regarding them as a windfall warranting new types of expenditure. With that thought in mind, the report warned against the danger that the receipts from sales might be dissipated by selling agencies.

The Senate bill originally provided that the proceeds of sales from surplus property should be turned into the general revenue fund of the Treasury. That was a sensible provision. It introduced safeguards against possible unauthorized use of funds by selling agencies. But it would be premature, to put it mildly, to require the Treasury to use the proceeds of sales to retire outstanding debt so long as the Government is running deficits of colossal size. No wonder the Treasury has registered a protest against this strange procedure. It has done so on the ground that it would be ineffective and would complicate its financial operations. It is interesting that the letter of protest stated that the Treasury "recognized the desirability of a debt-reduction policy after the termination of the war and would be prepared to submit recommendations at that time." However, the days of balanced budgets, to say nothing of budgetary surpluses, seem remote at present. Congress certainly cannot bring any nearer the day when the debt will begin to shrink by setting up special funds for debt retirement. There is just one way to reduce the Federal debt; that is for the Federal Government to spend currently less than it collects currently in the form of taxes and then use the surplus to pay its creditors.

Railroad Retirement Bill, H. R. 4805

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD O. McCOWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. McCOWEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, was introduced in the House May 15, 1944, and was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Up to the present time this bill has not been reported out of the committee.

I received a communication recently from the Federated Shop Crafts of the Norfolk & Western Railroad at Portsmouth, Ohio, in my congressional district, respectfully soliciting support of this railroad retirement bill, that is, House bill 4805. The membership of this organization, consisting of 2,000 men, deserves to have its wish for favorable action on this bill presented to the Congress, and that is what I am now doing.

It is my intention at the present time to support this bill whenever it comes before the House for action, unless amendments to it should be adopted that would nullify the main purposes of the bill. There are, however, a few constructive amendments, in my opinion, that could be made to this bill. For example, I should be perfectly willing to have the age limit for optional but not compulsory retirement lowered to the age of 55, and keep the upper higher age bracket as it now is. This, to some extent at least, would make for post-war employment.

In addition to that, there is a considerable number of railroad men who lose their jobs for some reason or other within a very few years short of retirement who do not get reinstated, and who do not receive retirement allowances. It seems to me that an amendment to remedy that situation might well be given some consideration.

I sincerely hope that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce may be able to finish the hearings and report the bill to the House in the very near future.

The Hidden Fight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a poem received from one of my young constituents, who is now fighting somewhere in New Guinea:

THE HIDDEN FIGHT

(By Corp. Izaak Walton Bader, Somewhere in New Guinea)

Can you, back home, in easy chairs and living as you do
Have any sort of inkling what the boys out here go through,
The agony of waiting on a small spot on the map,
The mud, the heat, the jungle bugs and then, of course, the Jap.
It isn't that we're angry, across the ocean foam,
But just what will our land be like, whenever we do get home?
There are, they say, four freedoms which we are fighting for,
The right to sleep a peaceful sleep, without the thought of war,
The right to speak our inmost thoughts, and want to never know,
To worship God the way we please whenever to church we go.
But will we have these blessings when we get to Frisco's shore,
Or will the greed of those back home destroy its very core?
You men who made the guns for us (at eighty dollars per)
And you who reaped the profits on the lives of boys that were,
Will you, when peace has come again and when we all can plan,
Divorce yourself from selfish thoughts and help your fellow man?
Or will you stand with palm outstretched, and beg and plead for more
And prate about the sacrifice you made to win the war?
We've got to have your answer, for when the triumph's won
We won't have time for platitudes, we've had them by the ton.
By God, we'll give you victory, although the cost comes high,
We'll sweat and stint and fiercely fight and some of us will die.
Remember though the soldiers who struggle for the right
To come back to a better world, don't let them lose the fight.

Detroit News Poll—Michigan Goes for Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Detroit News, of August 28, 1944. The Detroit News is nonpartisan and has the largest circulation of any paper in the Detroit area. No one could accuse this poll of being false or politically inspired. The Detroit News has a reputation of years standing for honesty and clean journalism.

I might add that our Republican Governor Kelly and the Michigan State Republican machine dumped Dewey when they split our ballots in Michigan. They did not want to carry Dewey on their shoulders, so they split the ticket into two parts. The President and Vice President run on one ticket, the Governor, State officials, Congressmen, and county officials on another. Every voter will get two ballots instead of one. They tried to save their own skins, but this will not save them.

ROOSEVELT, 66 PERCENT, DEWEY, 34, IN POLL—SURVEY SHOWS PRESIDENT MORE POPULAR THAN AGAINST WILLKIE 4 YEARS AGO

The first sampling of opinion in the metropolitan area by Detroit Speaks—the Detroit News Poll of Public Opinion, discloses that President Roosevelt's popularity in the area is greater today than it was when Wendell Willkie ran against him in 1940.

Using the same scientific sampling technique which has been proved so effective by the America Speaks polls conducted by Dr. George Gallup, Detroit Speaks' first poll shows that if the election were held today, 66 percent of those Detroiters interviewed who had an opinion would vote for Mr. Roosevelt, and 34 percent for Gov. Thomas E. Dewey.

The following table shows how voters in the metropolitan area answered this question:

"If the election were held today, for whom would you vote, Roosevelt or Dewey?"

(The percentages shown for Roosevelt and Dewey in the tables below concern only those persons who had an opinion; the "undecided" column shows the percentages of all the persons interviewed who had no opinion.

(In the metropolitan Detroit figure, for example, out of every 100 persons interviewed who had an opinion, 64 were for Roosevelt and 36 for Dewey. Out of every 100 persons interviewed, 8 had no opinion on the subject.)

Vote by all groups

	Of those decided		Undecided
	Percent for Franklin Delano Roosevelt	Percent for Dewey
Metropolitan Detroit	64	36	8
Detroit only	66	34	9
Dearborn	62	38	7
Hamtramck	83	17	15
Highland Park	67	33	8
Suburban districts	53	47	3

(The disproportionate number of "undecided" percentage points in the Hamtramck poll is attributed to the fact that voters in districts heavily populated by foreign-born are frequently reluctant to express their preferences, even when they have made up their minds.)

The heavy Roosevelt vote indicated in this first poll, especially when compared with the President's Detroit vote in 1936 and 1940 elections, raises a question as to the accuracy of Dr. Gallup's prediction that Dewey will carry Michigan. The America Speaks poll of Michigan voters, taken some weeks ago, gave Dewey 57 percent of the State vote, compared to 43 percent for Roosevelt.

1936 MARGIN RECALLED

In 1940 Willkie had to poll 40.2 percent of the Detroit vote to carry the entire State by a bare 9,000 votes. On that basis it appears unlikely that Dewey can carry the State with only 34 percent of the Detroit vote.

It would be possible only if Dewey's strength out-State proves to be so much greater than was Willkie's that his popularity there would overcome his weakness in Detroit.

As a matter of fact, the President's popularity in the Detroit area almost approaches the landslide proportions of the vote he received against Alfred Landon in the 1936 election. In that year the President received 68.9 percent of the Detroit vote to 31.1 for Landon.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND TO TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND

One of the imponderable factors in this year's Presidential election is the soldier vote, which cannot be polled because of Army and Navy restrictions. In Michigan, according to estimates by the secretary of state's office, the soldier vote will run between 150,000 and 200,000.

If this soldier vote is gaged purely on the basis of age groupings, then it will go overwhelmingly for President Roosevelt in the Detroit area. The following table shows how the persons interviewed in the first Detroit Speaks poll broke into age groups.

Vote by all groups

	Percent for Franklin D. Roosevelt	Percent for Dewey	Undecided
21–30 years	71	29	7
31–40 years	70	30	6
41–50 years	61	39	7
51–60 years	57	43	8
Over 60	44	56	8

The following tables show how the sample vote taken by Detroit Speaks divided according to sex, income, and occupation:

VOTE BY SEXES

	Percent for F. D. R.	Percent for Dewey	Undecided
Male	65	35	4
Female	64	36	12

VOTE BY INCOME GROUP

Very wealthy	21	79	0
Substantial	37	63	5
Comfortable	64	36	6
Just getting by	71	29	10
Poor	80	20	15

VOTE BY OCCUPATIONS

Labor	73	27	9
White collar	54	46	9
Executive	46	54	7
Self-employed	50	50	4
Widows and retired people	40	60	15

Launching of the U. S. S. "Little Rock"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BROOKS HAYS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1944

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the launching of the U. S. S. Little Rock at Philadelphia, August 27, 1944:

When the French explorer, Bernard de La Harpe, first discovered the point of rocks which became the site of our State capital on the Arkansas River in 1722, colonial Pennsylvania had little contact with the South and West. It was inconceivable at that time that some day citizens of Little Rock would stand here to christen and launch a magnificent vessel to bear the name of that remote place.

But history decreed that our political destinies should be united. Pennsylvanians moved to Arkansas and Arkansans moved to Pennsylvania, some to help in the construction of this ship. The movements of people across the continent established ties that are reflected in the names of our cities and towns. I have been in Chester, S. C., named not for old Chester in England, but for your adjoining city. I know that Scranton, Ark., is named for Pennsylvania's Scranton, and that Philadelphia, Miss., is named for this great metropolis. Names of places, therefore, often have a historic meaning and we who live in Little Rock are glad that the explorer gave it that name to distinguish it from the big rock up the river, and that this name—rather than Arkapolis, as the residents once chose to call it—was retained, for Little Rock is the tie to our brief but interesting past.

For more than a hundred years fewer people lived in Little Rock than will live upon this vessel, but as the State's population grew the city grew, and today 150,000 people live in Greater Little Rock. The little rock has become the great rock commercially and is now an object of pride and affection for the 2,000,000 people who live in Arkansas.

As it acquired power and greatness the city also acquired charm and beauty, and its own individuality. Likewise those who man this ship will make it more than a pile of steel and timbers, they will give it individuality and I should hope something of the charm and beauty of the city whose name it bears. Men will learn to love it as they loved the other ship honoring our State, the Arkansas, which they called the Arky, the old but still serviceable vessel which provided the first cruises for thousands of high-ranking officers during their plebe days at Annapolis and when the Arkansas moved into the invasion on D-day they were thrilled by her performance.

The people of Little Rock are proud to have such a ship as this bear their city's name. Even those of us who know little about the classification of naval vessels know that the cruisers have distinguished themselves in the Pacific war and that this is the outstanding type of combat vessel for that area. The Navy men tell us that the cruiser is the "work horse of the Navy," big enough to go into any battle, fast enough to lead any task force.

Carrying, as they have, the heaviest load in the Pacific where the fiercest battles have taken place, the cruisers have added new luster to naval history. We hope that in the time remaining before our enemies are put down the Little Rock will take her place alongside the Boise, the San Francisco, the Helena, and the Chicago, in preserving the prestige of the cruisers.

And finally a word of appreciateion for the workmen who brought the dream to fulfillment, who breathed life into the blue prints and specifications. We cannot comprehend the vast engineering problems involved in the launching alone that tons of lubricants must be laid upon the launching ways, the exact amount to be determined with mathematical precision and the meticulous calculations of the effect of a ship's weight upon its plunge into the sea. These are fascinating details which defy our understanding but the ship's dimensions, its carrying capacity, and its gun power give us a feeling of admiration as we consider the magnitude of your completed task.

Perhaps you feel that an old friend is leaving you today, that as it glides into the water the doors of the past will close, but there is a lift in the thought that it becomes a mighty force in our defense, a symbol of power and adventure.

We are glad to honor the workmen and the splendid company for which they work. I am sure we are all impressed with the spirit of teamwork which produced these magnificent results. One day, perhaps in 1942, the Little Rock, a cruiser, showed up in a list of projects, was scanned by a committee of naval experts. A congressional committee scrutinized those plans, and my colleagues in the Congress authorized the expenditures involved in its construction. In March 1943 the keel was laid and for 18 months materials for the ship have come from everywhere. The taxes to pay for it will be assessed against men and women of large and small resources. Team work from beginning to end did the job.

So with the war. A glorious victory lies ahead, but there is much remaining to be done. Only team work can supply the dynamic power yet needed to complete that victory. It seems to me that every ship launching is a reminder of the power to be acquired by people who work together for a purpose. On behalf of the people of Little Rock, I thank you all for your presence today and for the honor you have accorded my city.

The American Merchant Navy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS ROLPH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, yes; let us call it "the American merchant navy." The Log, published in San Francisco and devoted to American maritime activities, has an excellent suggestion.

Instead of American merchant marine, we should in future say American merchant navy. D-day would have been impossible without the efficient work by those men who man our ships. As a matter of fact, every day the Nation's war effort all over the world would be hopeless without the loyal and devoted service of our gallant seamen. Yes, let us take up the idea of our American merchant navy as set forth in the August issue of the Log.

LET'S CALL IT "THE AMERICAN MERCHANT NAVY"

From now on the Log suggests we call it the American merchant navy instead of the American merchant marine.

American cargo carriers are as much a part of our fighting fleet as the sister ships they serve. Without the delivery of supplies in a never-ending stream, the men o' war of our Navy could not carry on.

Nor can the fighting Navy carry on in peacetime without the merchant navy. They are inseparable.

How large an American merchant navy will be needed to back up the world's greatest fighting Navy is the first point to decide in determining the size of our permanent postwar cargo and passenger fleet.

The Log believes the term "American merchant navy" will be of great psychological value in winning the support of millions of Americans by acquainting them with these basic facts. No phrase more accurately describes the functions of American ships as military auxiliaries.

Internationalization of the Ruhr Valley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. WRIGHT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article appearing in the Washington Star of August 23, 1944:

THIS CHANGING WORLD

(By Constantine Brown)

The suggestion of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, Republican Presidential candidate, that the internationalization of the Ruhr Valley's armament production is an essential objective toward lasting peace has been received with skepticism in those quarters which have made it their business to watch the German war industry closely.

It is possible that Governor Dewey has not been kept fully informed about the German war industry. But, according to available figures the Ruhr's ammunition factories represent only a relatively small percentage of the total output of German war material.

Since the outbreak of the war a powerful war industry has been established between the Oder and Vistula Rivers where large quantities of raw materials are available. This area was chosen at a time when it appeared obvious to the German high command that the western portions of the Reich would be submitted to a continuous bombardment from the Allied air forces. But in addition to this eastern industrial area the Germans some time before the outbreak of the war established assembly plants and factories throughout the entire country and increased their facilities in Austria and Czechoslovakia.

In short, the area extending from the Vistula to the Rhine and from the Baltic to the Balkans has now become an important hub producing arms and ammunition in enormous quantities for the millions of men Germany has thrown into battle.

Had the Ruhr Valley been under international control soon after the World War Hitler probably would have had some difficulty preparing the Reich for another war. The Germans started planning their modern equipment soon after 1926, although prototypes of tanks and planes were built earlier in the U. S. S. R. One of the leading German officers in this war, Field Marshal Jodel, spent several years in Russia supervising their production and experimenting with them. The Russians learned tank technique from German officers and later improved it far beyond the skill of their original teachers.

But after Hitler rose to power and particularly after Czechoslovakia and Austria were incorporated in the Reich, the German war industry was spread throughout that entire vast region.

Moreover, it is pointed out, the internationalization of the war industry of the Reich alone will not necessarily end the threat of wars. According to political and technical observers, it might be necessary to bring about an internationalization and a strict control of all war plants in all the industrial countries of the world which consider force an important instrument of their national policies.

Unlike 1918, when the Allied political men refused to heed the urgent suggestions of their military advisers to enter Germany, the Reich this time will be occupied by the Allied forces for an indefinite period.

Moreover, if the pattern which has been discussed before is fully adopted the Reich will be dismembered. We had a revealing glimpse at the future of Germany by way of a recent dispatch from London that Premier Stalin had decided that Konigsberg would become a Russian naval base while important German cities such as Breslau and Stettin would be given to Poland.

The French, of course, will recover Alsace and Lorraine and may add for good measure the Rhineland, which they had attempted to incorporate under the guise of an autonomous Rhinish republic after World War No. 1. A large section of British political men desire to break up the Reich into its component parts and establish a number of independent republics as existed before Bismarck created the German Empire in 1871. There is nothing now to prevent the Allies from chopping up Germany and making it a powerless, divided country which will have lost all taste and ability to wage war for many generations.

Under these circumstances, the internationalization of the Ruhr Valley, as suggested by Governor Dewey as a "must" for lasting peace, will not fully answer the burning problem of how to prevent a third world war.

An agreement among all industrial countries to place their industries under an effective international control which would allow the manufacture only of weapons necessary for a police force may be the answer to the desire of those who wish to see power politics and aggressions removed from the scene of international relations. This, however, would involve the control of all industrial establishments in countries such as Russia, Great Britain and the United States as well as minor industrial states or potential industrial states.

Congress Needs Help

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to call the attention of the House to an editorial published in Tuesday's edition of the Washington Daily News advocating the passage of House Concurrent Resolution 54.

CONGRESS NEEDS HELP

The Senate some days ago passed the Maloney resolution providing for a joint Senate-House survey of the legislative machinery of Congress, with a view to modernizing some of the creaking procedures of both bodies, and now efforts are being made to get action in the House on the corresponding resolution sponsored by Representative MONRONEY of Oklahoma.

This is a more important matter than a first glance might indicate.

Of recent years the growing complexity of the Federal Government has outstripped the ability of the national legislature to keep track of what goes on in the departments and agencies. Many of the laws that are ostensibly the product of Congress actually originate in the bureaus, and are sometimes so formidably intricate that very few of the lawmakers who pass upon them have a real knowledge of their contents. Congressional committees in need of lawyers and economists to help in the preparation of bills tend increasingly to borrow such experts from the bureaus—and you may be sure that these gentlemen, knowing which side their bread is buttered on, will impart no advice that might damage the power or the budgets of the bureaus which lend them to Congress.

A principal objective of the sponsors of the proposed survey is to show the need of expert staffs, not on loan but on a permanent basis, to do the leg work and the research that Senators and Congressmen are not able to do personally.

The advisability of such an arrangement seems indisputable.

Congress today is too often at the mercy of ambitious bureaucrats who have at their command vast staffs of technicians, willing and able to back up their bosses' legislative requests with bales of graphs and statistics and analyses—which Congressmen have neither the time nor the facilities for examining or weighing. And when said Congressmen borrow these same experts as advisers—well, the dice are all too obviously loaded in favor of the executive branch as against the legislative.

The matter of expert staffing of congressional committees is only one facet of the Maloney-Monroney proposal, but it is a vital one. We should like to see the inquiry launched at this session, in time to have a good beginning made before the next Congress assembles.

Our State Department and the Jap's Incarnation of God

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a splendid article by Capt. Miller Freeman, United States Naval Reserve, retired, in which I fully concur:

OUR STATE DEPARTMENT AND THE JAP'S INCARNATION OF GOD

(By Capt. Miller Freeman, U. S. N. R., retired)

"The Emperor is the incarnation of God, who rules the universe. * * * If the whole world cannot understand this, our way of life, it does not matter. We can have only one purpose in our existence. We must bring happiness, contentment, and prosperity to the world in accordance with the commands and wishes of the Emperor." (Lt. Col. Sabura Aizawa, 1935.)

"May we meet again in the ashes of Tokyo," said a great United States naval leader to his men in the earlier, and more grim, days of the Pacific war.

It is a hope cherished by every United States military leader and, even more important, by every boy and man who has followed them through the bitter jungle, the bleak tundras of the Aleutians, or the sharp blue dangerous waters of the Pacific.

It will come as a surprise to the majority of citizens that there are other United States leaders who want to meet again in another kind of Tokyo—a Tokyo intact not only as to its cherry trees and beautifully fragile dwellings, but also as to individual Japanese citizens, old and trusted pre-war "contacts." To meet again in Tokyo, believe it or not, wherein the almost unbelievable tragi-comedy of the divinity of the Emperor is still preserved.

This is of tremendous importance to the people of the United States and yet the movement—and it is a very definite movement—stems almost entirely from the east coast, and in large measure from Washington, D. C., itself. But the fact that there has been almost no publicity about it west of the Rocky Mountains does not by any means indicate that the divinity-of-the-Emperor theory will not have its strong advocates in the Pacific area.

What is meant by "divinity of the Emperor"? The connotation of the "divine Emperor" is simple enough. But rather let us hear from a properly prejudiced man. He is J. B. Powell, formerly editor of the China Weekly in Shanghai, who was beaten daily in a Japanese prison camp, who lost both feet due to his treatment in a 28-foot square cell with 40 others, and who was a personal witness to the torture of 6 American flyers shot down in the Doolittle raid. It was a torture preceding their mass murders.

"The institution of Emperor worship," says Mr. Powell, "is a comparatively new creation in Japan. It was developed since the restoration, and for the purpose of fostering political unity on the ruins of feudalism."

To Mr. Powell, who has observed it at close range, there is nothing sacred about the institution. To him it is simply a cleverly devised scheme for compelling all Japanese to show submission to the Son of Heaven. It is of vital importance to the Japanese military in bringing people to accept the militant stand which resulted in the attack on Pearl Harbor.

IN WHAT DO WE BELIEVE?

As in any time of war, there has occurred in this country a great rebirth of religious feeling. There are few families not deeply and humanly touched by the war. As for the actual battlefield, it has best been said like this: "There are no atheists in fox holes," and the testimony of Army and Navy chaplains bears ample witness to the fact that insofar as our fighting young men are concerned this is a war for the preservation of Christian principles as well as a war against aggression and a war for economic security in a world of peace.

The very great majority of mothers and fathers of these boys are unaware of the appeasement movement which has already gained such considerable ground. If the fighters themselves were aware of it, there would be a cry go up that could be heard above the roar of guns from Saipan to the Kuriles. To these boys and men this most certainly is not a fight to preserve the Japanese way of life instead of the American way of life.

What is this line of thinking of Americans in high places who want the religious myth preserved? It is a line that has recurred again and again in recent years. The idea is that after the war a ruler may be "of use" in handling a defeated nation.

Was this particular ruler "of use" in handling Japan before December 7, 1941; and if so, how of use?

What kind of a government does the United States have in mind for Japan after the war? When our State Department is not merely vague, it does give a disturbing hint. This hint indicates definite support of the Emperor, and it finely differentiates him from the Japanese military clique.

Edward Hunter, on the war deck of the New York Post, has carefully analyzed a speech delivered by Joseph C. Grew, special assistant to the Secretary of State and former Ambassador to Japan. This speech was delivered before the ninetieth anniversary celebration of the Illinois Education Association in December of last year. The following excerpts are among those which interested Mr. Hunter, a foreign correspondent in the Orient for many years and long an opponent of appeasement. I take Mr. Hunter's pertinent excerpts and add my own queries for Mr. Grew:

"There is much obscure thinking in our country arising from an inadequate grasp of facts, which has brought about a deep-rooted prejudice against the Japanese people as a whole."

(Query to Mr. Grew: Does not the Japanese Army, with its widespread conscription, represent, just as does our Army, a fair cross section of the country? And are not the atrocities general?)

"Even in our own country we have our Dillingers and our reputable citizens residing in the same street."

(Query to Mr. Grew: But do we allow the Dillingers, because we believe in a blinding and false concept of our highest leader, to so influence that street that all the residents of it become fanatical plunderers?)

"The Emperor, after the military fait accompli at Pearl Harbor, was obliged, willy-nilly, to sign an imperial rescript declaring war."

(Query: Come, now, Mr. Grew, do you really believe that the Emperor was not cognizant of the plans to attack Pearl Harbor; didn't even know the attack was coming off? His envoys did, you remember, at the very moment they were talking with Mr. Hull in Washington.)

"After describing how Japanese people would stop Americans on the streets of Tokyo after the sinking of the Panay (1933) to apologize, Mr. Grew says:

" 'Those (word italicized by the State Department) people did not want war with the United States.' "

(Query: Have you ever suggested this to Admiral Yarnell, United States Navy, retired, under whose ticklish command the Pacific Fleet was at the time?)

When some of the eastern press took note of the Illinois speech they drew some inferences therefrom; and, I think, very understandably. But Mr. Grew has indicated to me in a personal letter that at no time has he supported the theory of the Divinity of the Emperor. For proof he submits a story from the New York Times which, he states, contains his true belief. In fairness to Mr. Grew, I quote the paragraphs he himself encircled with a blue pencil:

"Since returning from Japan a year and a half ago I have expressed in print and in public addresses a good many views about Japan and our war with Japan which I have felt might be helpful to our national effort. I need hardly say that those views have in no respect changed. Rather have some of those views become intensified, especially as a result of the atrocities committed in Japan by the Japanese military."

Note that he is still very finely differentiating between the Emperor and the Japanese people on the one hand, and the military on the other. The interview goes on:

"Recently, however, editorial comment in various newspapers throughout our country, clearly based on distorted versions of one or more of my public speeches, indicates that much of what I have said and written has been forgotten or overlooked."

The speech before the education association in Illinois was neither forgotten nor overlooked, as we shall show. And if it was distorted, then the distortion was that of the release by the State Department, and it was upon the release that most of the comment was based. But let us go on with the Times interview which Mr. Grew approves. After saying that the record stands and need not be rehearsed, he is quoted as saying:

"Nevertheless for the purpose of clarification I wish to state categorically that never, either publicly or privately, have I expressed the opinion that Emperor Hirohito should be or should not be retained on the throne of Japan after the war. Frankly, I do not think that any of us are yet in a position to determine what shall be or may be the precise political structure in Japan after our certain, ultimate victory in the war. I fear that only harm and no good can come from reading into my public utterances views which I have never held, and, therefore, never expressed."

Since reading that clipping I have rather often speculated what harm would come from suggesting that Japan should be beaten as completely as Germany, and that nothing but the few decencies left to modern warfare should be heeded in the beating. In a letter dated May 2, 1944, Mr. Grew stated to me: "I do not believe and never have believed in such a doctrine * * * have never enunciated that this Nation should uphold and exert its official influence to support and maintain the principles of the Emperor of Japan."

Perhaps Mr. Grew believes that the Nation should not so exert its influence. Yet it was so doing when the O. W. I. ordered that there be no derogatory references to the Emperor in broadcasts and other propaganda for overseas consumption. I hardly think that O. W. I., blown by many winds, was veered in this direction by any but the State Department. It would be ridiculous to think otherwise unless the idea was a notion of some "foreign expert" in O. W. I., and in that realm we are beyond all thinking.

The reader has noted that in the Times interview, which Mr. Grew likes, he says that he has never said that Hirohito should be or should not be retained after the war. We submit that either Mr. Grew has not made up his mind (a condition reprehensible at this point to the great majority of Americans) or that he has made up his mind, and dare not say in what direction for fear of offending either the American people or the Japanese friends he may meet again one day.

Mr. Grew's book, Ten Years in Japan, is revealing enough, but we leave it to Edmund Wilson, the astute reviewer for the New Yorker, to lift the curtain at its widest: "When you have finished it you come to reflect how little of the life of a country may be visible to a professional diplomat who has gone straight into the service from college and never known any other profession. Mr. Grew seems to observe nothing except those elements of the Japanese governing class with which his duties brought him inevitably in contact."

This is no attempt to discredit Mr. Grew personally, or to cast doubt upon his sincerity of purpose. But because his attitude—whether it be uncertain or secretive, and obviously it is one or the other—is the attitude of the State Department, it is of concern to you and me.

Certainly Russia, at peace now though she is with Japan, does not want too strong a Japanese Nation after the war. And Chiang Kai-shek has made clear his belief that "as to what form of government Japan should adopt, that can better be left to the awakened and repentant Japanese to decide for themselves." Perhaps he recalls that an awakened China, within the memory of hundreds of living Chinese, repudiated the idea of a "Son of Heaven."

Most disturbing is the quick fashion in which these ideas grow within our own country. Mr. Grew may insist all he please that he has been misunderstood. Then let it be noted that he has been misunderstood by experts. Such a reputable publication as the Atlantic Monthly believes it understands him clearly. In its February issue it lifts aloft the theory of the divinity of the emperor, ascribing it to Mr. Grew, and indicates its blessing. Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS, no less than chairman of the Senate military affairs subcommittee on war prisoners, urged respect for the Jap love of emperor in the American Magazine. Countless newspaper editorials have cottoned to the idea. The fortnightly Amerasia, a recognized authority on events in the Pacific, believes it understands him clearly indeed. In its issue of June 9, 1944, it says: " * * * it is clear that the attitude of the State Department will in large measure determine the policies adopted by the United Nations toward China and toward Japan in the immediate postwar period * * * For this reason the position of the Director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs in the State Department has become one of the most important foreign relations posts in the world. It is therefore not surprising that the appointment of Joseph Clark Grew, former ambassador to Tokyo, to succeed Dr. Stanley K. Hornback has aroused great interest both in this country and abroad."

Despite modifications, Amerasia says, "The Chicago speech clearly reveals what Mr. Grew meant by 'the healthy trunk and roots' of Japanese society." This forthright magazine further points out, that Mr. Grew's viewpoint is ably represented at all times by his special assistant, Eugene H. Dooman, a man who himself has admitted is an opponent of "a tough peace" for Japan.

Thus do we feed the Japanese propaganda machine.

So accustomed have we become to the Japanese propaganda line over a period of 50 years that even when we are at war with them, even when we isolate the Nisei and export the aliens, our high fever runs on without personal attention from the blandishments of the Japs themselves. Unquestionably many a disloyal Japanese now isolated would have liked to have remained at large. Unquestionably his work was planned for furthering sabotage and doctrine. There need have been no worry on the part of the enemy. Their actual presence in the United States is not necessary to their cause, and it may be, even, that we will do it better than could they. As in the past, for more than 50 years there will always be Americans in high places who will do such work, wittingly or not.

Unless—unless the great majority of the American public, the men and women who are furnishing the sons and the labor and the money for this war, insist that they have no interest in maintaining the religious myth of a foreign country. More, that they believe in their minds and hearts that the maintenance of such a myth means a short-of-victory war with Japan—and that, in turn, means another war with Japan. Another war with Japan will be fought under conditions we cannot now imagine, against Japanese allies no human can foresee.

We need not fight that war if we follow God and our conscience as to what is right—instead of seeking to uphold a lone human being who is the Japs' incarnation of God.

Germans to Murder 150,000 Warsaw Poles—Polish Warsaw Home Army Appeals for Help

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, there is rejoicing in Paris today, but in Warsaw the most bitter struggle that the world has ever seen is raging now.

When the Russian armies approached the gates of Warsaw on August 1, the Polish underground forces, the Polish Home Army, led by General Bor, started the Battle of Warsaw. With very little war equipment and ammunition they have put up a valiant fight. They desired to join in the fight to free Warsaw, just the same as the French desired to join in the fight to free Paris. The French had more arms and the fight was not as tough. For one whole month the Poles of Warsaw have been putting up a terrific and bitter fight, bloody and costly, but have not surrendered and still hold one-half of the city.

This is no time to argue that the uprising was premature. What if they did not receive instructions from Russia, England, or the United States to commence the battle against the Nazis? Is this the only excuse that one can find to deny aid and assistance to a valiant and heroic people? Were not the Russian armies at the gates of Warsaw when the Poles started their fight for the liberation of their capital city? Did they not suffer for 5 long years under the brutal and savage Hun?

What city and what people suffered more than the Polish people in Warsaw? Most people would cringe like whipped dogs after the brutal punishment that these people had received. There would be no fight left in them. Yet, these people sensed liberation and freedom. The urge was too strong and the fight was on. Mr. Speaker, the battle of Warsaw is on. There is no retreat. There can be no truce. They must either win the battle or die.

What shall we do? Turn a deaf ear to their pleas, and say we are sorry, you started too soon, you were premature? We must not and cannot let down a heroic and courageous people that have suffered for 5 long years the brutality and tyranny of the Huns. Help must be forthcoming immediately.

To take revenge upon the Polish home army of Warsaw and to bring about their surrender and capitulation, the German authorities aim within the next few days to exterminate more than 150,000 Polish civilians concentrated in a wholesale-slaughter camp near Warsaw. The Polish Government is urgently calling upon the entire civilized world to do everything possible to prevent such a monstrous crime.

I am including a statement to the press, issued on Monday, August 28, 1944, by Jan Ciechanowski, Polish Ambassador to the United States.

The Germans are guilty of another atrocity, exceeding by far anything they have hitherto done, including the treatment of civilians in concentration camps.

When the Polish home army started the Battle of Warsaw on August 1, the Germans realized that they were faced with a well-organized armed uprising by regulars and trained guerilla fighters. The Germans decided to stop this uprising of the Polish home army by retaliating against the civilian population and by taking their revenge on innocent civilians.

The German authorities aim at the extermination of the entire civilian population of Warsaw. All parts of the city captured and held by the Germans were surrounded by strong military forces and the population of all these districts was deported to Pruszkow, a small industrial town 15 miles southwest of Warsaw, where a wholesale slaughter camp was installed. The deportees were prohibited from taking any of their belongings with them. They were forcibly driven to Pruszkow as they stood, without any food, extra clothing, or medical supplies.

According to authenticated information in the hands of the Polish Government in London from the Polish underground civil administration, more than 150,000 persons, mostly women, children, and older men—as able-bodied men are in the ranks of the home army and are still fighting inside Warsaw—are concentrated in the Pruszkow camp. They are being starved, tortured, entirely deprived of food or water and facing inevitable death. Untold scenes of horror in the Pruszkow camp are beyond description.

It is obviously the aim of the Germans to bring about the extermination of this population within the next few days, and this appears to be the reason why they were not deported farther west.

The Polish Government urgently appeals to the Governments of the Allied Nations and to the entire civilized world to do all that is possible to prevent the perpetration of this final act of German barbarity, unprecedented in history. Only the immediate intervention of the Vatican, of the Allied and neutral powers, of the International Red Cross, supported by the weight of the indignation of all free democratic public opinion may still stop the Germans from carrying out their heinous design of mass slaughter of defenseless and innocent civilians.

Suggestions to Servicemen and Servicewomen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, in a series of extensions I have outlined for the veterans of this war, the benefits available to them, both in their readjustment to civilian activities after their return from service, through the provisions of the G. I. bill and the program for the vocational rehabilitation of the handicapped, and by way of compensation for the treatment of disabilities. The benefits available to the dependents of the servicemen have been summarized also, including benefits while the men are in service and benefits for the continued support of dependents in those cases where the serviceman has made the supreme sacrifice.

Now, drawing upon my own experiences in World War No. 1, and upon observations during the past quarter of a century in assisting veterans of World War No. 1, and more recently of World War No. 2, I wish to offer some suggestions to the members of our armed forces which may prove helpful and of value at some future time.

First. Remember the folks at home. Write every week. You know you are O. K., but the folks do not.

Second. Time has a way of making you forget little details you might want to remember in years to come—places you have been, actions in which you participated, people you have met, dates of happenings in which you were interested, and so forth. So put as much of these matters in your letters as censorship will permit. Tell the folks to save them for you.

Third. Keep your own service record. Start two, keep one up yourself and carry it in your billfold. Send the other to the folks at home and send them copies of entries you make so they can keep the duplicate complete. In this record might be entered:

(a) Your name, serial number, and original organization and station.

(b) Dates to remember: Date of induction or enlistment and place of admission; of transfers to other units, stations, or ships; of promotions; of departure from and return to the States; and finally of discharge.

(c) Draft information: Number and address of your draft board. Your draft number and induction order number.

(d) Insurance: Number, date, and amount of each insurance policy taken out. Names and addresses of designated beneficiaries, and if more than one, amounts allocated to each.

(e) Name, and when possible permanent address in the United States, of your commanding officer, your lieutenant or immediate superior officer, the noncommissioned officers of your company or unit, your squad members and barracks or shipmates, and of other servicemen with whom you have been closely associated.

(f) When you make application for disability compensation or pension after discharge make your "C" number a part of this record.

Fourth. Other suggestions:

(a) In case of injury or illness, get the names and addresses of persons who know the facts. If treatment or hospitalization is required, write home giving all possible details and facts—and have the folks preserve such letters. Get the name of the medical officer who attended you, of the nurses who cared for you, and of some of your ward mates in the hospital, with their home addresses. You never can tell when some small detail of which you wrote or made a record, or which some of those persons could furnish if you could find them, will be the fact on which your right to future benefits might depend.

(b) Preserve your discharge. Only one original will be issued. No duplicate is obtainable. Immediately upon your return home have a small photostat made to carry. Register the original with the register of deeds—there is no charge. Then place the original discharge in a place of safekeeping. If it is lost only a certificate in lieu of discharge can be obtained.

(c) Register with an employment-service office for a job. If you want the old job back, make a claim for it within 40 days after discharge.

(d) If you do not already have one, get a social-security number.

(e) Be proud of your service. Wear your discharge lapel button, which you should get on discharge. If you did not, apply for it at the nearest Army or Navy station, or office.

(f) Join a veterans' organization—the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, the Purple Heart, if you are eligible, or some organization of World War No. 2 veterans. Take part in its activities. It will provide you association with men with a common interest for the rest of your life. And, incidentally, it will be an ever ready source of help in any problems involving veterans.

(g) If you need hospital care or medical treatment after discharge, get it when you need it. Do not put it off. That is the reason for maintaining Veterans' Administration facilities—hospitals. You have earned it; you deserve it. Take advantage of it.

Fifth. Final benefits. After all other benefits are given, there remain three final benefits when you have answered the last roll call:

(1) Uncle Sam makes an allowance of $100 to whomever pays the funeral bill. Application must be made within 2 years.

(2) A large American flag is available at the nearest post office for your funeral service.

(3) A uniform grave marker, upright or flat, of marble or granite, will be furnished, freight prepaid. In cemeteries where stone markers are not acceptable a bronze marker may be obtained after the war.

In every post of every veterans' organization and in the offices of the Red Cross you will find friends anxious to serve you when help is needed. Feel free to call upon them. Your Congressman, ERRETT P. SCRIVNER, 316 Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C., is always ready and willing to be of assistance.

Toward an International Economic Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I include in my remarks an interesting article appearing in the August 1944 issue of Dun's Review entitled "Toward an International Economic Program" and written by Willard L. Thorp, trustee, Associated Gas & Electric Corporation.

This is a well-considered and prepared article, excellently presented by Mr. Thorp, and worthy of deep consideration:

TOWARD AN INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC PROGRAM

(By Willard L. Thorp, trustee, Associated Gas and Electric Corporation; editor, Dun's Review; director of Economic Research, Dun & Bradstreet, Inc.)

One of the great failures of our country after the last war, was in the field of international economic relations. The learned statesmen who sat at the peace table focussed their attention on political problems—boundaries, minorities, plebiscites, mandates, and the like. They reserved the basic economic problems for the League of Nations, but the proposed machinery never shifted into high gear. Not only did we as a Nation fail to join in the consolidated effort to meet these problems, but in our own national policies we proceeded to disregard completely the new facts in the international economic picture.

The war and post-war period established us firmly as a creditor Nation by the normal course of trade. On top of that, we endeavored to increase the obligations of others to us, by insisting on the validity of various public international debts which had arisen in the providing of the sinews of war. We added billions of dollars of new private loans made to private and public borrowers in foreign countries. We set up a special Government agency to work with businessmen to increase our export trade.

And then, at the same time, as though it were a factor in a different world, we built higher and higher tariff barriers around our boundaries to keep out goods from foreign countries. The consequences were inevitable. Those programs could not balance. Foreign borrowers defaulted one after another on their loans. Foreign countries endeavored to keep their international trade in balance by erecting higher and higher barriers against our goods. Monetary standards were destroyed. Bitterness and ill will crept into international relations.

It is true that we then were relatively unsophisticated in the area of international economic policy. It is also true that the basic facts had changed substantially since the nineteenth century. To the extent that public policy usually takes the form of a recognition of facts and conditions some time after their appearance, we were following the age-old pattern. But the lag has now been so long that we can no longer offer it as an excuse. Now the facts are clear.

We shall again want to send our goods abroad. We shall again be a lender in the capital markets of the world. Our position will be even more strongly that of a creditor nation. We should know by this time that such a position is untenable unless we open our ports to the importation of goods and services. The payments for the use of our capital and for our exported commodities must be made in American dollars. The foreign purchaser can lay his hands on American cash only if Americans have paid cash abroad for goods, services, or securities which they have purchased.

There, of course, is one definite indication of some recognition of the facts of international life, in the reciprocal trade-agreements program. Its gradual application, built upon careful study by experts and detailed international negotiation, has operated to lower barriers to trade. It is important as an evidence of a new direction in foreign policy, but the limitations which surround its application make it small arms rather than heavy artillery.

The problem is not solely one of permitting the purchase of foreign goods by American consumers. International economic relations is a large-sounding phrase covering a number of complicated and often technical areas. Problems arise from such economic matters as shipping, aviation, access to raw materials, patent rights, allocation of markets, cartels, sanitary regulations, and a host of others.

Furthermore, a nation's international policies are not separable from its domestic policies. For example, there must be an effective international medium of exchange. This in turn involves the domestic monetary and banking system of each nation. Again, the problem of international credit, both as to controls and machinery, is tied up to each domestic economy.

It is essential that the peoples of the world move ahead on the post-war international problems now. Sometimes putting things off serves a useful purpose, as when the letter eventually does not need to be written, or the problem disappears or is solved by someone else. In this case, the outlines of the problem are clear today and will not change. There is absolutely no possibility that it will disappear. Today, we have the maximum opportunity to find the right answers. As time goes on, little decisions here and little decisions there will steadily narrow our freedom to find solutions. And today, we are not in that difficult position where the pressure of the necessity of the short-run interferes with long-run wisdom.

There are those who argue that we should put these problems aside until after the national election. But the problems are clear. The facts are clear. The votes cannot change them. It is much more important to move ahead while we are in close and continual contact with the other nations. The coalition for war is a marvelous atmosphere in which to strive for a peace coalition.

What can we do? First, I think that there is a basic job of education to be done. We still are doing a lot of our thinking in nineteenth century terms, when we were building our industries and borrowing abroad. Today, the facts lead clearly to the broad outlines of a program for the future, a program looking toward the lowering of trade barriers, and the stabilization of monetary and credit conditions. In such a program, both the hard-headed and the big-hearted can join.

The hard-headed can support it because, instead of providing protection for a few favored industries it will protect our investors, our consumers, and our credit and monetary systems. The big-hearted can support it because it is a program not limited to our own national advantage, but aimed at international economic health and well-being. These things must be said over and over so that they become an accepted part of our national thinking.

In addition to education, however, we also must have action, and have it soon. It is easy, and sometimes necessary, to generalize. But actual programs must be in very specific terms. Of course, the experts have been busy in this area, as evidenced by the several proposals for dealing with the problems of credit and currency. But, we as citizens can well be impatient. We do not know what our national policy is in this whole area. It is not enough for the experts to labor. We must have frank, thorough, and public discussion of the issues involved.

The peace will bring many problems to trouble and confuse us. Now is the time to determine our basic attitudes. Even then, there is much work to do, for there is no one quick gesture which will solve our many international problems. They require long and skilled labor plus time and patience.

There is a well-established technique, the international conference, which is being used most effectively in connection with problems of food and of relief and rehabilitation. The same technique should be extended to the problems of international currency and credit arrangements, and of international trade. These are world problems, and should be attacked by the nations together.

It should be sufficient punishment to have to fight a Second World War, without adding a second post-war failure. The time has come to shift into high gear, driving hard toward a clear-cut national policy and a series of international conferences to implement it.

Address by Hon. Chapman Revercomb, of West Virginia, Before Convention of Veterans of Foreign Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHAPMAN REVERCOMB

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me before the convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars at Chicago on August 23, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The year 1944 may well prove to be the most fateful in the history of the American Republic. We are in the midst of a great war, a war in which our forces are advancing victoriously on the far-flung battle fronts of the world. For us, the threat of invasion has vanished. Each day we know that complete victory in the clash of arms is nearer; and that perhaps soon we shall turn from the suffering and destruction of war to resume again lives of peace and peaceful progress.

The year 1944 is also, under the law of our country, the year set aside for a general election of some of those who will represent the people in their National Government. It is the time when our citizens traditionally inventory their public affairs and select those whom they will place in office for the next several years.

In discussing the subject of the welfare of our country, there is no body of our citizens with whom I would rather meet than with you and the other veterans of this country who have followed the flag to all parts of the world. I know that you place your country above all else. I know that your patriotism is strong and genuine.

Let me say at the outset that I plead no partisan cause. There never was a time in the history of the United States when our people were more earnest in their political thinking and less attached to party labels than they are today. The conflict is not one of platforms and personalities; it is a clash of philosophies of Government.

On one hand we have those who believe that the best Government for America is the one that leaves the Government in the hands of the people themselves, under laws that forbid wrongdoing and that protect each individual in his right to live his own life and make his own way. I subscribe to that view.

On the other hand are those who urge a centralization of power in the National Government, and, in particular, in a Chief Executive; who believe in a strict regulation and ordering of the lives of the people.

Between these extremes some compromise is possible, but it is not easily achieved. It can never be achieved except in the light of keeping the individual citizen free.

It can never be obtained so long as Government is dominated by any group within our citizenship who would subvert the Government to their own selfish benefits, destroying the basic rights of each individual American.

When I speak of groups, I mean any group, whether it comes from Wall Street, from business, from labor, or from the farms, or elsewhere.

The claims of each must be heard and considered, but a government which has its policies dominated and directed and controlled by any group does not serve the best interests of our country. In the younger years of the life of each of us we were told and believed that America is the land of personal opportunity; the one country in the world where an individual could rise by his own efforts from any level to places of culture and comfort and influence and power.

That made America and it must be restored to America. I know that as veterans you have fought under the flag of your country, that your deep thought is with those boys who today fight under that same flag. That there is in your hearts the hope that they shall return to an America where they may live in comfort, with an opportunity to work, to make a living, to rear their families, to maintain their homes. That they shall have the freedom of an open road; that no bars shall be placed across their path by any theory of government that would strictly regulate their lives.

Your Congress has passed the G. I. bill, and it has become the law of the land. It gives certain temporary help to the discharged serviceman. It provides certain benefits for him if he should be up against hard going in the future, but I want to say that it will be a tawdry gift unless he has the opportunity and the right to return here to a country of freedom such as you and I and our fathers had.

Now, I realize that in time of war certain of the individual liberties of the people must be surrendered, in order that concerted action may be taken against a foreign enemy. But no greater duty is upon the Government than that it should restore to the citizens the freedom of action and personal liberties taken from them to meet the emergency of war.

Those controls that come out of wartime centralized Government must be ended. No form of dictatorship or plan of dictation should be set up over our people or any segment of them.

The laws we make must encourage and invite the people to return to peacetime employment. The needy, wherever they may be in our land, must be cared for. Those who, in fact and in reality, cannot sustain themselves, because of lack of places to work, must be helped through the Government, because there must not be and shall not be want or bread lines in America. However, we should not establish here the idea that those who can sustain themselves and have the opportunity to do so may lean upon their Government for support. The right of every American citizen to seek his own proper way in life must be sustained and safeguarded unto him.

The maintenance of such an order in this country will be a far greater gift to the heroic men to whom we owe so much than the justified provision that has already made for them by their Government.

The workers of this country have in result done a magnificent job in creating the needed materials of a consuming war. Industry in most part has met its obligation unselfishly. The wheels of industry must be kept turning to the greatest possible extent that men and women may find places of work and that there may be as little need as possible for a dole.

Most men and women here want to support themselves. They have that self-respect and independence. These high traits must be recognized and places of work protected for the American people.

There are some who have adopted the philosophy of a government by taxing and spending and regulating. That existed prior to the war. During the war it has had justification to some extent. But now we are preparing for a post-war period; for an America at peace; for an industrious, progressive America.

It appears that there are some who would continue the theory of taxing and spending and regulating, even for the days to come. That is a dangerous course. With some justification, caution was thrown away in spending for war. But that can find no sound basis when war has ended.

Today there is upon the backs of the American people a national debt that threatens to reach the gigantic sum of $267,000,000,000—a debt that is increasing at the rate of $228,000,000 each day.

Some people have the impression that if they have no property they have nothing to lose, no matter how high the national debt goes. Nothing could be further from the truth. If this Government should ever be forced to default on its obligations, it goes without saying that there will be no checks for veterans' assistance, no payments for assistance to the aged, the blind, and the handicapped; no unemployment compensation for unemployed workers, and, further still, no jobs out of which our people may earn their livelihood.

We have been told repeatedly, and the information is correct, that America is one of the richest countries of the world. Through the industry and freedom of our citizens we have built the finest cities. Providence has given to us broad, fertile acres. Our people enjoy the best comforts and conveniences of life invented to this time. But the total wealth of the United States can be measured in dollars and cents and our resources, already partly depleted by this costly war, while remaining comparatively great, are not inexhaustible.

The total value of all property in the United States in 1938 was $390,430,000,000, according to information provided by the Library of Congress. That figure represents the value of the business known as the United States of America. If our debt should substantially exceed that figure chaos will come. Such chaos breeds fratricidal strife and civil war. The ties with the people are severed; the old leaders are reviled and new ones are blindly followed. We have seen this happen in Germany and in Italy. I warn today, without excitement, but with fairness, that there are signposts in our country that point toward national socialism. That generally finds its growth out of a broken economic structure and a desire by a group to rule over and dictate to the people.

National socialism is built upon these elements in government: (1) Reckless spending; (2) creation of class hatreds as a matter of policy; (3) domination by a group; (4) division of the people and appeasement of minorities; (5) government operation of private business; (6) strict control over the private lives and actions of the people; (7) perpetuation of itself in office; and (8) the sacrifice of principle to unjustified expediency.

Consider these elements in choosing the course that our Government is to take.

In a world aflame; when we have sent from the hearthsides of this country our children to battle upon foreign shores and in the air above them, and upon the oceans, it is natural that our people should think in terms of world relations. We think in such terms with the hope that we may not be involved in another war—that some plan may be made among the nations that would prevent war. That is a justified and a laudable purpose.

This Nation will enter into any plan with the other nations of the world that would prevent the possibility of war or even delay the coming of it. But this Nation should not enter into any plan that will destroy the sovereignty of our people over their own dominions. Our people shall govern themselves. We shall be helpful and cooperative, yes, even benevolent toward those other nations that seek peace with us; but that benevolence shall come as a gift of this Nation and shall not be delivered at the command of others. It shall be based upon fairness and cooperation, but not through domination. America will continue to stand for her own independence and the protection of her own people. Other nations and their leaders will do this and we admire them for it.

We shall seek peace with all the world, but henceforth let us keep at hand a strong armament. Never again must we be so impractical as to be unprepared for the eventuality of force and attack that may come. In the words of a great American, "henceforth, we shall speak softly but carry a big stick."

We subscribe to peace. We will help lay and sustain plans for the keeping of peace, but we will do so in a practical way, knowing the frailties of man that have been so often exhibited since the rise of the curtain of history on his life, from the beginning until now.

With justice and consideration for our people, we should ask in fairness that those airports built throughout the world with the money of the American people shall be kept open for American commerce. Modern invention has drawn us so closely together that we know and we recognize that we are dealing more frequently and more closely with the people of other lands from day to day.

The freedom of the air over the oceans will be recognized, but the freedom of the air over America shall be under the control of the American people; just as the freedom of the air over the lands of other nations shall be properly controlled by them. And the use of the air over the land should be subject to grants of rights-of-way and lanes through it.

Whatever we do under the great policies of government will be decided by the American people. Whatever the decision may be, let us face it squarely and openly with the basic thought of what kind of life we are preparing for our own returned sons and daughters—our children and their children.

We are winning the war. I pay great tribute to the military and naval leaders who, with the American soldier and sailor and marine, have so gallantly upheld the honor and the glory of their beloved land. It is up to you and to me, who through circumstances have been left here, to see to it that they return to a strong America where freedom shall be the precious heritage of her people.

Latin-American Unrest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very enlightening article on a subject in which all of us are vitally interested, particularly at this time. The article, which is entitled "Latin-American Unrest," was written by Mr. William Philip Simms, who writes for the Scripps-Howard newspapers.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LATIN-AMERICAN UNREST

(By William Philip Simms)

While the United States is fighting fascism in Europe reports from Latin America indicate growing unrest on our own side of the Atlantic due, in part at least, to Fascist-minded elements.

The root of the trouble seems to be in Argentina, centering around the pro-Nazi regime in Buenos Aires. But it has spread to Bolivia, Paraguay, Brazil and elsewhere. Unless checked it will almost certainly increase after the war.

The reasons for this are obvious. First, the richest German and Italian colonies in the world are in Latin America, notably in Argentina and Brazil. Many prominent Nazis have transferred large slices of their fortunes to those countries and are expected to follow in person as soon as they can leave Europe. There they will set up in business and begin to branch out.

Second, Argentina is traditionally against whatever the United States is for. She regards herself as a sort of rival and bitterly resents Yankee leadership in Latin America. She aspires to primacy herself and the first step toward securing it is to organize an anti-Yankee bloc among her neighbors, then push northward at least as far as the Panama Canal. The expected influx of Nazi refugees and German capital would fit in with these ambitions.

Third, our own relations with Latin America may well cool off somewhat after the war when lend-lease dwindles to a dribble and foreign rivalry for American business down there becomes acute.

Trustworthy sources in Bolivia report that the new regime of President Villaroel is playing ball with Buenos Aires as closely as ever. Its principal backers are said to be a clique of 47 young army officers, blood brothers to a similar clique behind Argentina's General Farrell. American recognition of Villaroel, it was urged, would insure the election of a democratic regime at La Paz, and recognition was accorded on June 23. But 10 days later the same old reactionaries piled up a landslide, winning 83 out of a possible 136 seats in Congress as against 21 for the combined parties of the Democratic Union plus a few scattering independents.

Events of this kind complicate Washington's efforts to achieve and maintain hemispheric solidarity. The State Department is being urged to apply economic sanctions to Bolivia. Others advise the contrary course. Both are repulsive to American ideals. One amounts to a big stick policy, the other to a form of bribery. But to do nothing in the face of Fascist maneuvers which may lead to bloodshed in our part of the world would be judged as national weakness.

Brazil has long been our biggest and warmest friend south of the Rio Grande. Yet Foreign Minister Aranha, well known as a pro-American, only recently was forced to resign by what resembled a humiliating Fascist trick. The national police closed a Friends of America meeting just as he was about to address it.

The Germans are extremely rich and powerful in southern Brazil. From there they maintain close liaison with their German and other friends across the border in Argentina.

Information for Servicemen, Veterans, and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS E. MILLER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in the many duties which are ours as Members of Congress, one of the first in my judgment is to keep the people at home informed of legislation of particular interest to them. I refer in this case to the benefits which we in Congress have provided for the service men and women, veterans and their dependents.

The many requests for information regarding these benefits indicates the need for a digest of the law on the subject that may be used as a ready reference and sent by the families, if they so desire, to their relatives in service, thereby keeping service men and women fully informed of the protection provided under our laws, and the necessity for compliance with the details in connection with making application for benefits thereunder.

Our Government should be liberal with those who wear its uniform in time of war. Our servicemen are the best paid, best trained, and best equipped in the world. The fact that our veterans and their dependents are better provided for than those in any other country is further proof that America cannot and must not forget those who fight and die to sustain the kind of life we cherish in America. Whether our forces serve at home or upon foreign fields, we must at all costs maintain that form of government which they have loved so deeply and have fought so nobly to sustain. Our matchless men and women in uniform will win this war, but we in Congress must provide the basis for a permanent peace and a lasting prosperity at home.

I am happy to have had a small part in the enactment of this legislation and I shall bend every effort to make sure that while these boys and girls are away the pure fountains of our form of government shall not be polluted with the poison of some foreign isms or tainted with the dangerous doctrines of political plotters at home.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES FOR DEPENDENTS

Dependents of all grades of enlisted men and aviation cadets of the Army and Navy are eligible to receive a dependent's allowance from the Government in addition to the serviceman's allotment. Those men and women serving as officers come under another system. The allotments and allowances provided by the Government are as follows:

Class A dependents: A wife, $50; a wife and one child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife, $42; a divorced wife and one child, $72, and $20 for each additional child. (NOTE.—If the divorce or separation order of the court does not call for alimony or separate maintenance, the wife will not receive any allotment, and in case of a court order providing alimony or separate maintenance, she will get no more than the amount fixed by the court.)

Class B dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is substantially, but not completely, dependent upon the serviceman for support. A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent and any number of brothers and sisters, $37; two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37.

Class B–1 dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is completely dependent upon the serviceman for support. One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; one parent and each additional brother or sister, $50 plus $11 for each brother or sister; two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $68 plus $11 for each brother or sister; a brother or sister but no parents, $42; each additional brother or sister without parents, $11.

It is important that men and women with dependents make application through their commanding officers for allotment and allowance, as these benefits will begin the date application is filed. Allotments are compulsory only for class A dependents. If the service man or woman for some reason or other fails to make application or is in a position where he or she cannot make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. The Army requires their regular application blank to be filled out; the Navy requires merely a letter giving the name of applicant's wife and children and dates of birth. In case a man is reported missing in action, the allotment and allowance continue to be paid for a period of a year, unless, in the meantime, his status is definitely determined.

Parents and brothers and sisters who can prove dependency can receive an allowance at the same time as wife and children. Parents can get an allowance from more than one son or daughter in the service. For instance, if two parents are greatly dependent upon a son or daughter in the service, they get $68 per month. Now, if another son or daughter in the service helped support these same parents, they can get another $37 from the second son or daughter.

The agency for the Navy having jurisdiction over allotments and allowances is Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C. The agency for the Army is Office of Dependency Benefits, War Department, 213 Washington Street, Newark, N. J. If you experience any difficulty, contact your Congressman.

TEMPORARY AID FOR DEPENDENTS OF SERVICEMEN

Sometimes cases of extreme hardship arise involving dependents of servicemen. Many dependents, and even members of the armed forces themselves, are not fully acquainted with the two emergency agencies set up for the express purpose of helping such persons in need. These two agencies have branches all over the country. They are the Army Emergency Relief Fund, whose functions have recently been assigned to the Red Cross, and the Navy Relief Society, which also can be reached through the Red Cross.

ARMY RELIEF FUND

Any member of the armed forces in the Army can appeal to the Army Relief Fund, represented in all camps, or through the Red Cross if the soldier is not at camp, for needed immediate financial assistance. He will receive courteous and willing assistance at all times. The fund is also open to all dependents of men and women in the Army and anyone needing relief should get in touch at once with this fund through the local Red Cross.

NAVY RELIEF SOCIETY

Any serviceman or servicewoman in our naval forces or his dependents can appeal to this agency for urgent financial assistance. To get immediate action, it is advisable to take the case up through the Red Cross.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

This benefit is payable to all honorably discharged personnel of our services whose rank is below captain in the Army and lieutenant senior grade in the Navy. Payments are made in the following sums: Personnel with less than 60 days' active service, $100; personnel with 60 days or more active service none of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $200; personnel with 60 days or more active service, any part of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $300. Whenever mustering-out payments amounts to more than $100, payments are made in monthly intervals of $100 each. Servicemen who are discharged at their own request are not entitled to muster-out pay.

FREE MEDICAL AND NURSING CARE FOR WIVES AND INFANTS OF MEN IN OUR ARMED FORCES

Under this plan a wife of any man in service may receive prenatal care from a qualified doctor at her home or at the doctor's office. At childbirth, whether the wife of the man in service stays at home or goes to a hospital, she and her baby can receive free medical and nursing care. Complete maternity care is provided, including a physical examination 6 weeks after the baby is born. Besides all this, the baby is entitled to free medical care during the first year of life.

The wife should see a doctor at the first sign of pregnancy. She should then ask the doctor for an application form to apply for this free service. If the doctor does not have these blanks, write to the Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, Missouri State Board of Health, Jefferson City, Mo., and ask them to send a blank to you. Fill out the application blank carefully. Be sure to include your husband's serial number. The wife fills in part 1 of the blank. Ask your doctor to fill in part 2 at once and send it immediately to Jefferson City for approval. It is important that wives apply for this in early pregnancy; the State board of health will not approve payments of the doctor, hospital, or any service, before the application is made out. In the case of emergency, be sure that the doctor makes application for you within 48 hours after service is rendered. If the application is not made within 48 hours, no bills for medical or hospital service will be paid. The charges are paid directly to the hospital and the doctor and the nurse; no money is given to the wife. This service is extended to wives and infants of servicemen in Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Alaska, but not to any other foreign country.

SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY PENSIONS

Our honorably discharged veterans of all wars are entitled to a pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by their service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10-percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as a hand, foot, or eye, blindness, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month.

The disability claim is filed by the veteran for benefits payable to him as the result of injury or disease resulting from military service. The award of compensation is based on the degree of disability which is determined according to the Veterans' Administration schedule provisions. Any disability, except misconduct, is compensable if it is as much as 10-percent disabling. This application is known as form 526. It is simple to execute and seldom does one have any trouble answering the questions. Additional evidence is seldom required. This is particularly true on the adjudication of the initial claim. No subsequent formal claim need be filed. If the veteran is dissatisfied with his present rating he can submit medical evidence to this effect.

However, it should be borne in mind that the doctor's statement must state not only his diagnosis but sufficient findings to warrant it. It is essential that this evidence show, or at least indicate, a higher degree of disability than the present evaluation. Upon receipt of competent medical evidence the Veterans' Claim Service will authorize an official physical examination for rating purposes, thereby reopening the case for further consideration.

Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred from one Veterans' Administration facility to another, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged for disability whose claims, with essential service and medical records, are forwarded to area offices for settlement, veterans should file claim on proper form which will be supplied them by any Veterans' Administration facility, or the local representative of the American Red Cross. If the disabled person is insane or incompetent, the manager of the Veterans' Administration facility will file all necessary claims for him.

READJUSTMENT TO CIVIL LIFE—EDUCATION

One of the provisions of the so-called G. I. bill of rights offers an education to any man who served for a period of 90 days, on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of the present war, and who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, and who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service. Application must be made therefor within 2 years after discharge. The Government will pay to the school of the veteran's choice up to $500 per year for tuition and books and will pay to the veteran $50 per month maintenance if without dependents, and $75 if he has dependents. Any man who served 90 days on or after September 16, 1940, may receive 1 year's schooling and 1 month additional education for each month in active service, but in no event shall the total period of education exceed 4 years. There is also a provision for part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance but with payment of tuition and other expenses.

A veteran also has the right to vocational education for service-incurred disabilities, extended to those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

Application for education and training should be made to the Director, Servicemen's Education and Training, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

HOSPITALIZATION AND PROSTHETIC APPLIANCES

Adequate hospital facilities are provided for the care and treatment of veterans for nonservice disabilities or diseases as well as for disabilities or diseases incurred in service.

The veteran has the right to adequate prosthetic appliances and necessary training to effect the greatest possible benefits in the use of such appliances.

RIGHT OF MEDICAL REVIEW OF IRREGULAR DISCHARGE OR RELEASE FROM ACTIVE SERVICE

A veteran has the right of review in cases of irregular discharge or release from active service, (a) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to determine whether the person at time of committing the offense was insane, in event of which determination, benefits to which the person would otherwise be entitled shall not be forfeited; (b) except in case of separation by sentence of general court martial, any enlisted man or officer may have a review by an authorized board to determine the correctness of such discharge or dismissal; (c) any officer retired or released to inactive status without pay may likewise have a review by an authorized board to determine retirement rights.

Under both (b) and (c) above, the claim for review must be filed within 15 years after discharge or dismissal or within 15 years after the effective date of the act, whichever be the later.

LOANS FOR THE PURCHASE OR CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES, FARMS, AND BUSINESS PROPERTY

Loans provided for the above-mentioned purposes or for the alteration or improvement of buildings or equipment may be guaranteed not to exceed 50 percent of the loan, the total amount guaranteed as to any one person not exceeding an aggregate of $2,000. Loans may be made by an individual or by private or public—State or Federal—lending agencies or institutions. The interest rate must not exceed 4 percent. The loan must be practicable and suitable to veterans' circumstances. The loan must be repaid in 20 years. Application must be made to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

EMPLOYMENT OF VETERANS

A veteran of any war, honorably discharged from any one of the services, has the right to register for employment and for placement in employment by the Veterans' Employment Service. He should contact his local United States Employment Office in his home town or county.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

There is also a provision for unemployment allowances of $20 per week while unemployed. To be eligible, the person must reside in the United States; be completely unemployed, or if partially unemployed, at wages less than $23 per week; be registered with and report to a public employment office; be able to work and available for suitable work.

Any person will be disqualified if he leaves suitable work voluntarily without good cause or is suspended or discharged for misconduct; if he, without good cause, fails to apply for suitable work offered; if he fails, without good cause, to attend an available free training course; if he is participating in a strike or labor dispute causing a work stoppage.

BENEFITS FOR DEPENDENTS AS A RESULT OF LOSS OF SON, DAUGHTER, HUSBAND, OR FATHER

There are four money benefits provided for the dependents of a deceased veteran: 6 months' gratuity payment, monthly insurance payments (if the serviceman applied for insurance), monthly pension, and back pay.

GRATUITY

The gratuity is a lump-sum payment equal to 6 months' pay at the rate received at the date of death. In addition, the dependents of any private or seaman who dies in foreign service receive 20 percent of his base pay, and the dependents of any officer who dies in foreign service receive 10 percent of his base pay. If the serviceman was in either the flying service or submarine service, his dependents receive, in addition, 50 percent of his base pay. There is also a longevity provision in addition to the above amounts.

The gratuity is automatically paid to a wife of a deceased veteran, or if there is no wife, it is automatically paid to the surviving child or children. It is not automatically paid to parents or brothers or sisters of an unmarried serviceman. The serviceman should designate some one of this latter class to receive it; however, if he does not, they may apply for it. If two parents survive, the amount is divided between them. A grandparent must show an insurable interest in order to receive it.

Application should be made by the surviving relative of a soldier to: Gratuity Pay Branch, Finance Office, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue NE., Washington 25, D. C.; by the surviving relative of a seaman to: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

MONTHLY INSURANCE PAYMENTS

This insurance is not paid in a lump sum; it is paid on a monthly basis, depending on the age of the beneficiary—the older the beneficiary, the higher is each monthly payment. On a $10,000 policy, if the beneficiary for whom payment is first made is under 30 years of age at the date of death of the insured, payment shall be made in 240 equal monthly installments, at the rate of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance. If the beneficiary to whom payment is first made is 30 or more years of age at the date of death of the insured, payment shall be made in equal monthly installments for 120 months certain, with such payment in installments continuing during the remaining lifetime of such beneficiary. For instance, under a $10,000 policy, a 50-year-old beneficiary will get $53.90 monthly. Under the same policy a 70-year-old beneficiary will get $85.10 monthly, and so forth.

It would be well to have parents and next of kin check with the men and women in service to see that all insurance certificates are in order and in the hands of the persons designated by the service men or women to receive them. An insurance policy taken out by men and women in service can name any of the following as beneficiaries: Wife, husband, child, stepchild, illegitimate child, parents, brother, or sister, including those of half blood. There is nothing to prevent a parent or brother or sister from being the beneficiary of more than one serviceman.

All dependents and next of kin ought to check their insurance policy now. See that everything is in order now. It might save a lot of grief in the future. Negligence has caused many a beneficiary to lose out. A little care can avoid a lot of trouble should anything happen. I would suggest that you send your serviceman this pamphlet so that he may check all matters pertaining to his beneficiaries.

MONTHLY PENSIONS

This pension is paid automatically to a wife and children. All children under 18 are eligible. Children up to 21 are eligible if they are in school up to that time. If a child marries before 18 or 21, they are not eligible for this pension. Parents who have been dependent upon the deceased man or woman in service are also entitled to a pension. Parents who have been dependent upon a deceased serviceman can get a pension at the same time his wife and children are getting a pension. The amounts of the monthly pension are as follows:

One parent, $45 a month. Two parents, $25 each. Widow but no child, $50; widow with one child, $65, with $13 for each additional child. No widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38 equally divided, with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100.

The fact that a widow, a child, or parent gets the insurance, does not prevent them from getting a pension also. They can collect both insurance and a pension.

BACK PAY DUE THE SERVICEMAN

When a casualty occurs, that service man or woman who has become a casualty may have back pay coming. All this back pay is paid to the nearest heir. Application should be made by the surviving relative of a soldier to: Finance Officer, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue NE., Washington 25, D. C.; by the surviving relative of a seaman to: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

HEADSTONE FOR GRAVE

Any person may make application for a headstone for the grave of any veteran of any one of the Army or Navy services whose service was honorable, to the Quartermaster General, War Department, Washington 25, D. C.

BURIAL ALLOWANCE FOR ANY WAR VETERAN

After honorable service, reimbursement for burial may be allowed, not exceeding $100, on burial, funeral, and transportation expenses. Application should be made to Director, Dependent Claims Service, Veterans' Administration, Washington 25, D. C.

Burial in a national cemetery may be arranged for any honorably discharged veteran or for anyone who dies while in active service, with right of burial therein of his wife or widow, and under certain circumstances, his minor children or adult unmarried daughters.

WRITE FOR OTHER INFORMATION

It is exceedingly difficult to cover all the details of benefits available to veterans of this and previous wars. I have tried to sketch briefly the benefits particularly relating to World War No. 2, as many pamphlets have been printed covering the provisions for veterans of other wars. I merely offer this digest as a guide to servicemen, veterans, and their dependents. If anyone has special questions or individual problems not covered in this summary, I suggest you write to me personally, to the following address: LOUIS E. MILLER, Room 343, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Excerpts From Speeches by Hon. Alexander Wiley, of Wisconsin, on Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from speeches delivered by me from 1939 to 1944, inclusive, on the subject of foreign policy.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 1, 1939, volume 84, part 2, page 2078:

"I do not believe in turning the hands of the clock back and sacrificing the international law the centuries have builded. I do not believe in resurrecting the buccaneers and pirates, national or individual, of yesterday.

"International law and order and good will and common sense are part of the world's heritage of which we are custodians. Let us not, as did Essau of old, sell our heritage for a mess of pottage. There is no need for us to play the traitor to the future."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 24, 1939, volume 84, part 5, page 4679:

"This country demands and has a right to have 100 percent political allegiance from all of us; and the way to keep our allegiance unsullied and keep America alone in our thoughts is to think American. At this time of crisis each individual in this Nation has the responsibility of building national unity, and that is not built by meddling in foreign affairs."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 16, 1939, volume 85, part 2, page A308 (remarks before the Interparliamentary Union in Oslo, Norway, August 1939):

"From every land in Europe America has drawn her bloodstream. Your culture has enriched our lives. Your music, your literature, your drama, your great ideas in economics, philosophy, religion, we have made our own. But, Mr. President, you have something we do not want. I refer to those large barriers of fear, hatred, and distrust erected between your nations by centuries of fear, hatred, and distrust. Yes; we owe you much. We know the world is small. We are neighbors. We want to help you, but your problems are so intricate. There are so many equations that we do not understand. I say we want to help, but we want to help you to help yourselves to the end that your problems may find solution through you. We want to be helpful, but America does not want to meddle in Europe. The role of a meddler I do not crave for my country."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 16, 1939, volume 85, part 2, page A309:

"Our job is to see that a foreign policy is created which will protect and defend America."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 4, 1941, volume 87, part 2, page 1714:

"This bill, H. R. 1776 (lend-lease) * * * confers on the President the discretionary power to do the following: To open the arsenals, factories, and shipyards of America to any combatant nation; to transmit or dispose of to any combatant nation on such terms as the President may deem satisfactory any or all weapons, aircraft, ships, machinery; to repair, outfit, or recondition any ship, airplane, etc., of any other combatant nation; to give any combatant nation any defense information relating to any defense article furnished by this Government * * * This is intervention—yes, close to involvement. Under ordinary circumstances it would mean war."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 4, 1941, volume 87, part 2, page 1718:

"We are again—if this bill becomes law—passing a domestic law which runs directly contra to international law."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 24, 1941, volume 87, part 3, page 2505:

"I am voting against the pending $7,000,000,000 (lend-lease) appropriation for the following reasons:

"'1. As a protest against the President's failure to inform Congress what collateral he will secure.

"'2. It gives the President a blank-check power.

"'3. The appropriation is not backed up by a realistic tax program.

"'4. Because there is no disposition on the part of the administration to cut down on nondefense items.

"'5. Because the power of the Congress with reference to appropriations has become synonymous with the "must" request or dictates of the Chief Executive—with no explanation as to how it is to be secured, how it is to be spent.'"

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 8, 1941, volume 87, part 9, page 9509:

"America has been attacked in a dastardly manner and war declared on her by Japan. This is undoubtedly pursuant to the tripartite agreement between the Axis Powers, Germany, Japan, and Italy.

"We as a people did not want war; it has been brought to us. Now we will take care of the job. There is no division in our ranks now. The criminal attack on Hawaii and Guam and elsewhere has made America one. We have but one purpose, and that is to win the war and preserve our American way of life.

"Let us now have:

"(a) Less loose talk and more action but no underestimation of Japan's strength.

"(b) More defense production and more for our money.

"(c) Extension of the workday for everyone. This is no time for hysteria or complacency; no time for life as usual.

"(d) No grafters or racketeers should be permitted now in Government or in industry.

"Japan asked for it. We will, with God's help, carry through to victory."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 7, 1943, volume 89, part 10, page A1674:

"The world has been contracted through science and discovery, and this makes it vital that we have cooperation and collaboration. * * * We can set up machinery to control nations in an effort to prevent war. We can establish treaties, we can write peace pacts, we can make agreements; we can do all these things in an effort to achieve a lasting peace. But none of these things will have eliminated the causes of war. If we are to build for lasting peace, we must first restore order and recovery to the world by (1) dealing justly with the problems which involve the political, economic, territorial, and ideological phases; (2) we must create some sort of instrumentality with power to preserve the peace."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 30, 1943, volume 89, part 11, page A3322 (speech at Republican convention at Appleton, Wis., June 27, 1943):

"The Republican Party recognizes that as one of the major nations of the earth, the United States must accept a major share in helping to restore and preserve international law and order in the post-war period. The Republican Party proposes that a strong America shall be a strong champion of international justice; that a purposeful America shall help weave the pattern of durable international peace and order; that an America, aware and confident of her own great state, shall help relight the lamps of freedom for the groping nations of men."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 14, 1943, volume 89, part 6, page 7535 (telegram sent to Senator ARTHUR VANDENBERG at Mackinac Island Conference, September 6, 1943):

"United States must cooperate actively with all other like-minded nations in an effort to preserve world peace. World peace can be best assured only when sovereign states, while preserving their own full sovereignty and their own essential interests, find common ground on which to work together. This common ground can be found only by clearing away existing differences, particularly among the major allied nations, and building on the basis of definite common purposes a new international order. Until such time as international relationships become beyond all question orderly and secure" (the people of this country want us to keep our eyes open. They know that in this matter we are dealing with international poker players who have been playing the game for 1,000 years and they believe that) "the United States should maintain such armaments as will not only enable us to discharge our international obligations but will assure our national security." (The people believe that the United States should secure adequate air and naval bases to assure our national security.)

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 14, 1943, volume 89, part 11, page A3774 (speech before Kiwanis State convention, Milwaukee, Wis., August 2, 1943):

"Our real problem in international affairs is the same as on the domestic front—how to attain the unity that alone makes peace possible * * * unity between States and nations is not a matter of legislation only. It is a matter of learning how to live and work together. * * * There is much talk about a new world order. We know until the spirit of cooperation dwells among men, until that time arises, mere government forums will not do the job."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 28, 1943, volume 89, part 11, page A4041 (speech before the Catholic Knights of Wisconsin, September 9, 1943):

"Theirs—the major powers—is the major task of post-war reconstruction. Theirs is the major obligation, building up a new international order of law and justice and fraternal freedom. They should invite the cooperation not only of all their associates; they should invite the cooperation of all the peoples and states which pledged to work for peace and law. It is not necessary to build some superstate to accomplish a new reign of world law. Talk of such only creates confusion and distrust. We have learned to our bitter cost that mere constitutions, that mere treaties and covenants, are meaningless unless the will and purpose which give them sanction, are present."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 4, 1943, volume 89, part 7, page 9082 (voted for Senate Resolution 192):

"We have demonstrated by the passing of this resolution that we are willing to cooperate by all honorable means to achieve peace. Resolutions do not contain magic power. No resolution we adopt will have magic power over our allies or over our enemies. * * * We have been burned in two world wars. * * * We know that making another Locarno Pact, or another Kellogg-Briand Pact outlawing war, does not do the job unless there is the will of the contracting parties to enforce and keep the peace."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 12, 1944, volume 90, page A129:

"As a matter of fact and as a matter of common sense, there is nothing at all contradictory in free and equal and sovereign States organizing to promote world peace and world justice. * * * It should be obvious beyond all question that only Americans who believe in our own system without reservations, hidden or open, should be entrusted with the important task of protecting and promoting legitimate American interests in the four corners of the earth."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 15, 1944, volume 90, page A195:

"The United States not only has an historic interest in these islands—the Carolines, the Marianas, and the Marshalls—we have a much more direct and immediate interest as a matter of national security. * * * As outer defenses of our west coast, as stepping stones and lines of communication with the densely populated lands of southwestern Asia and its islands, the three-ocean groups are of major importance to this country. * * * They should be incorporated definitely in the American system."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 21, 1944, volume 90, page A330:

"Just as no single state is powerful enough to achieve its own total security, so no single state or group of states can undertake to set up a system of world security without recognizing the reasonable security of the small as well as the great, the weak as well as the strong."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 8, 1944, volume 90, page 2206:

"There must be back of all pacts or treaties or organizations not only the desire to carry on, not only the desire of like-minded people and like-minded public officials to cooperate, but there must be the will to carry through the mandate, the pact, the treaty. * * * But if the nations begin double dealing, if they begin playing international politics, if they begin to sell each other out and fail to keep faith with each other, then all the ten commandments in international law will not result in the peace being kept."

"Let there be no mistake about it. We must have international world planning. We live in a contracted world. We cannot escape our obligations. We will be false in our trust if we did not endeavor to participate in some kind of thinking which would insure that our children and our children's children shall not again travel along dreary roads to armed international conflict."

Management of Money

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Management of Money," by L. L. Coryell, Sr.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MANAGEMENT OF MONEY

(By L. L. Coryell, Sr.)

"When Edgar Allan Poe wrote his famous poem The Raven, he said he was writing a poem the world would call great and no one would know what it meant. I sometimes think the articles written on money fall in that category," says Mr. Coryell. But we're sure you will find his article very interesting reading.

From the dawn of time it has been necessary to have a medium of exchange so men could trade commodities. In Homer's time a good woman was worth four head of cattle. The young swain, going a-courting, paid his prospective father-in-law four cows for the buxom daughter, maiden of his choice. Since the young fellow couldn't carry cattle around with him in his search for a wife, he gave the old man four pieces of wood, stone, or bone in exchange, each marked with the head of a heifer. The receiver exchanged these orders at the farm of the owner for the cattle. In other words, they were like our bank checks.

The end sought in establishing any system of money is to have it definite and sure, not contracting and expanding like the girdle in the fairy tale. The value of the dollar should be just as stable as the length of the yardstick, the capacity of the bushel, peck, or quart measure.

Money, like all other commodities, is governed by supply and demand. If we have a surplus or a shortage of wheat, the price will go up or down accordingly and few people will be materially affected but the quantity of money governs all else because all values are stated in terms of money. Contraction of the currency invariably causes a panic and an expansion of money destroys values, causes confusion, business uncertainty, and worst of all, it impairs life's savings, life insurance, pensions, endowments, etc.

The expansion or contraction of currency is a fight between debtor and creditor. If money is knee deep in the street, a man could take a bushel basket and gather up enough of it to pay off his mortgage. France printed money enough in 1925 and 1926 to pay off her World War debt, but where is France today? Contraction of the currency brings mortgage foreclosures.

To show the disaster of decreasing and increasing our circulation I quote the Republican platform of 1920: "We pledge ourselves to earnest, consistent attack upon the high cost of living by courageous and intelligent deflation of overexpended credit and currency." I also quote the Democratic platform of 1924: "We denounce the recent cruel and unjust contraction of legitimate and necessary credit and currency." Both statements were correct. The Republican policy withdrew over $5,000,000,000 in bank loans and discounts and brought disaster as mentioned by the Democrats. The Democrats have taken the other side and have increased our circulation from $35 to $161 per capita (nothing like it in American history) and the results verify the statements of the Republicans in 1920—confusion everywhere, at home and abroad. Mr. Bowles and Mr. Jones are "scratching like cats on a tin roof" and accomplishing about as much in trying to correct the evil. With a changing quantity of money, no grocer dare invest, no man dare buy a home, no man dare go into big or little business.

I think money, at all times, should be a creation of law. I would have a financial board of experienced men who would serve life terms, that board to be constantly in session, watching financial conditions. That board could expand or contract the quantity of money to a certain degree, according to the conditions at hand, thus the value of every commodity would yield to that of money. I would have sufficient money with which to do business. I would never create enough money to cause inflation. So sacred do I hold the quantity of money in circulation that I would not use metal of any kind.

Some of our best economists claim that the period of a thousand years, known as the Dark Ages, was brought about because the only money at that time was intrinsic gold and silver. The mines failed, hence there was no medium of exchange; no way to improve the country culturally or financially. We should not have our money volume affected by the quantity of metal mined or used in the arts and sciences. For example, in 1849, when gold was found in large quantities in California, we came near inflation because there was so much gold in circulation, and again, when the old lady washed the overalls of a miner in Cripple Creek and found that, with soap suds, she could extract gold from the dirt carried in the miner's clothes.

A further objection to metal money is its cost, its so-called semi-intrinsic value. Within the past few years we have found that the value of gold is a creature of law. If it is our law that makes the value of money just as good on paper as it is in gold, what is the use to work millions of men in the hazardous, arduous business of mining gold?

A few years ago, with a single stroke of the pen, we almost doubled the price of gold, thereby proving that it is American law that makes the value of gold and not gold that makes the value of American money. This gold which we now have in our vaults has been shipped back and forth, stolen, plundered, and traded for centuries. I imagine some of this Kentucky gold came from the mines of Ophir. I imagine the Queen of Sheba carried some of this gold on her camels. No one has ever eaten it or used it for material good—science and mechanics excepted. I, with a true American boast, while talking to a German in Berlin, said: "You fellows have no gold," to which he replied: "No; we don't want anything that does not work." I call that smart.

I consider the issuance of money purely domestic to our own Government, just as much as I consider the legislative, executive, and judicial departments absolutely our own affair. We cannot delegate or extend, to foreign nations, our legislative, our executive, our judicial, or our issuance of money. They are fundamental principles. If we want to extend charity to foreign nations, good and well; give until we starve to death if we want to, but there is no justifiable reason to upset our internal affairs.

This might bring the barter system until foreign nations could establish their own money like they establish their own government. The establishment of any government and the establishment of its monetary system should go together without any of our interference. Nothing would stabilize world money more quickly than to have our own money stable and nothing will demoralize our money more quickly than to mix it with the money of a lot of heathenish, "busted," warring nations. I have traveled in 73 nations and have never had any trouble cashing American money.

To guard well the quantity of our money in circulation I would date all of it, having it good for 10 years, at which time it would, upon presentation, be subject to exchange for other bills of the same denomination but dated ahead another 10 years. Money not presented for renewal would be considered lost and other money would be issued to take its place which would be clear profit in the Government and would keep our circulation normal.

When I was in Russia an iron box was uncovered in the Moscow Tunnel. This box was full of American paper money, none of it dated later than 1890. While this money had been buried for approximately 50 years, it was considered in our circulating volume. We do not know how much is buried, how much has gone down in the ocean, how much has been burned or lost. The dating system would correct this every 10 years. It would also stop the hoarding of actual cash. Mayor "Big Bill" Thompson (Chicago) would not have put a fortune in safety deposit boxes, thereby taking it out of circulation.

I will admit there is much that affects the flow of money, such as bank deposits, the velocity of money, big commercial contracts, money abroad, etc. That is true with wheat; there is the bread, the baker, the trucker, etc., but we should change the amount of money in circulation with great caution, keeping about the same amount of money per capita in circulation at all times with the safeguard of a skilled board which could make limited alterations. Such a system would throttle any scheme of controlling the lifeblood of our business. Inflation, deflation, panics, and uncertainly would be things of the past.

Coming Down My Creek

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. SIDNEY CAMP

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem published in the Atlanta Journal by Harry Stillwell Edwards:

COMING DOWN MY CREEK

(By Harry Stillwell Edwards)

THE CORNER STONE

Freed of the nurse and the doctor's hands,
Crippled and weak, and swathed in bands,
Wreck of a man, in the prime of life—
Out of its dreams, out of its strife—
Helpless and useless evermore,
A bit of wreck on a storm swept shore,
Jest of the waves, plaything of Fate—
Roosevelt of the Empire State!

"Take him away," the surgeon said;
"Life calls to us, not the lips of the dead."
They wiped their knives, they called it a day,
They donned their coats, and they went away,
From blue-gray eyes, and heart of a child,
The crippled outcast looked and smiled.
They left him there on a crutch alone—
Him, the builder's rejected stone.

The fight began; a man against death,
Pain submerged in each drawn breath—
Immortal light in the blue-gray eye—
Who dared to live, who refused to die.
Gethsemane; the dungeon's rack;
The tortured nerve ere the sun came back;
But ever the brave heart without guile,
And ever the dauntless Roosevelt smile!
Aye, the fight went on, one man against death.

And throbbing pain in every breath;
Trailing his way with a shriveled limb.
The eyes of the people turned on him.
They swung their hats, and cheered him on.
The cities' key. Then he was gone;
Lifted high in strong men's hands
Answering a call and a state's commands.
Then darkness fell on a frightened land,
Starvation wandering up and down,
Nowhere the touch of a helping hand,
God in heaven look down! look down!
Where art thou, Jesus, our brother, found?
Wealth had fled from the merchants' till;
Silent the loom, and idle the mill!
And millions of idle men, grief-crushed;
And the moans of their little ones ever unhushed!
God in heaven, to Thee, we cry!
Help, oh God, we die! we die!
We had forgotten Thee, Jehovah;
Our trust was in riches, and our pride
In the victory of bloody hands,
We counted our bonds, and we hugged our gold.
And we taught our little ones over and over
Our bloody deeds in the foreign lands!

We lived in luxury, day and night;
We sang of arms and the glory of fight,
Forgetting our sons that the war gas slew;
Planning, still planning, for horrors anew,
That we the weapons of death might sell—
Forgetting Thee, and forgetting hell.
Now the ashes are upon our head,
Now we cry to Thee for bread, for bread!

Upon the heights there came a man,
Immortal lights to his blue-gray eye,
Who had dared to live, who refused to die!
And over the land a murmur ran!
Around him the radiance of a new day shone;
Undaunted, still and still alone!
And his voice rang out, "If you would be free,
Lift up your hearts and follow me;
Cast off your fears, and break the rod!
Have faith in yourselves and faith in God!"
And the cheering people looked up to him;
"Here is Valley Forge," they said,
"Here is Trenton, and Lexington
And Bunker Hill come back in one!
Here is a man who was not afraid
To brave King's Mountain's embattled crest,
And slay the vulture in his nest!
Here is Manassas and red Shiloh,
And Gettysburg where to and fro
The blue and the gray in valor mix—
Here is the Spirit of Seventy-six.
Aye, here are Lincoln and Davis, too;
The cheer of Forrest sounding through;
And here is Jackson, the man of doom,
And Grant and Lee and the Stuart plume;
And Moffett and Semmes of the boundless sea;
Here is the land of the brave and free
And here is the manhood of '63."

God in Heaven, before Thy throne
We bend the knee, in shame, atone—
We did not see Thy outstretched hand,
Thy temple is built, "peace blesses the land!"
We cursed Thy name; in our grief we said,
We asked of Thee bread, and Thou gavest a stone—
We did not know 'twas the Corner Stone!

American Prisoners of the Japanese Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, the American people, and especially the relatives of our nationals who are held in custody by the Japanese Government, are deeply interested in ascertaining all facts with reference to the treatment accorded those persons, and Chairman BLOOM of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House appointed a subcommittee composed of myself, Mr. RICHARDS, of South Carolina; Mr. BURGIN, of North Carolina; Mr. VORYS, of Ohio; and Mr. SCHIFFLER, of West Virginia; to look into this matter and to cooperate with the executive departments of the Government in doing everything possible toward facilitating the exchange of these prisoners.

On May 26, 1944, as chairman of the subcommittee appointed by Chairman BLOOM of the Foreign Affairs Committee to investigate the facts relating to American nationals interned or held as prisoners of war by the Japanese Government, I made a brief speech, giving the result of the investigation made by that committee. And we decided, in view of the interest of the American people in this subject, and especially the relatives of our nationals so interned, that we would continue to try to secure all information and do everything possible to cooperate with the executive departments of the Government relative thereto.

I am in receipt of a letter from the Honorable Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, dated August 29, 1944, giving further information as to developments since June last upon this subject, and under leave granted I submit same herewith:

AUGUST 29, 1944.

The Honorable LUTHER A. JOHNSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. JOHNSON: I refer to Mr. Berle's letter of June 21, 1944 which transmitted to you copies of a chronological record of the efforts which had been made as of June 6, 1944, to arrange for the shipment of relief supplies to American nationals in the Far East. In view of the intense personal interest shown by you with regard to the plight of Americans in Japanese custody and because of your official position as chairman of the House Subcommittee on Foreign Affairs, I take this opportunity to inform you of subsequent developments in the negotiations being conducted with the Japanese Government in behalf of American nationals in Japanese custody. I am enclosing for your convenient reference a copy of the Department's information sheet of June 1, 1944, which summarizes the steps taken by the Department in behalf of American nationals in Japanese custody up to that time.

Since June 1, the Department has continued to give its close attention to all phases of this distressing problem with a view to bringing further relief to American nationals in Japanese custody in any manner possible and by any means that might be utilized. These efforts have resulted in a recent agreement by the Japanese authorities to permit American prisoners of war in the Philippines to receive financial relief. The Swiss Government has been requested to make the necessary remittances from United States Government funds on deposit with the Swiss Government to the maximum amount which the Japanese authorities will allow individual prisoners to receive. That amount is approximately $10 a month per individual. As you will recall, civilian internees in the Philippines have for some time been receiving financial assistance provided by the United States Government. The Swiss Minister at Tokyo has standing instructions, upon which he has acted from time to time as the need arose, to increase this financial assistance whenever necessary to maintain an adequate subsistence level for these people. Our continuous endeavors to secure Japanese permission for the extension of similar financial assistance to prisoners of war in the Philippines has, as I said above, finally succeeded.

The Japanese authorities also agreed recently to permit the extension of financial assistance to American prisoners of war and civilian internees held in the Netherlands Indies, and the Swiss Government has been requested to make the necessary remittances.

Elsewhere in the Far East, in territory under Japanese control, financial relief is being extended to all American prisoners of war and civilian internees who can be reached either by Swiss Government representatives or by delegates of the International Red Cross Committee. Both the Swiss Government and the International Red Cross Committee have been given broad discretion as to the disbursement of funds in order to ameliorate to the greatest extent possible the conditions of detention of American nationals.

While, owing to the continued refusal of the Japanese Government to allow neutral observers to visit camps in the Philippines, our information on conditions in prisoner-of-war camps there is deficient, reports received concerning camps elsewhere in Japanese-controlled territory indicate that conditions are not as bad as we had feared they might be. Of interest in this connection is a statement attributed to General Wainwright which was incorporated in a recent International Red Cross report that conditions in his camp in Formosa are "as good as can be reasonably expected." Encouraging as is General Wainwright's statement, you may be sure that we will not relax our efforts on behalf of our national in the Far East.

It is fully recognized that by means of financial assistance alone the required amount of relief cannot be furnished our nationals in the Far East. As stated in the Department's summary of June 1, efforts have been made continuously since the spring of 1942 to arrange for the regular and continuous shipment from this country of food, clothing, and medical supplies for distribution to these American nationals. The situation with which we have been confronted in this regard is outlined in section 6 of that summary. As stated in the Department's press release No. 214, dated June 6, a copy of which is enclosed, there is reason to hope that in the near future it may be possible to open a supply route to the Far East by which shipments may be made on a continuing basis. A further communication from the Japanese Government indicated the general approval of that Government to the use of the port proposed by the Soviet Government, but imposed certain additional conditions which must be met before these shipments can begin. Those conditions, which require the agreement of the Soviet Govment, are now under consideration by that Government, and a public statement in regard to this matter will be made as soon as a reply from the Soviet Government shall have been received.

After long and painstaking negotiations with all the governments concerned, we were recently able to get their agreement to carry mail via the trans-Siberian railway to Teheran, whence our Army planes carry it to the United States. Mail to Japan now goes by the same route. As a result of these arrangements our people in Japanese custody should be able increasingly to exchange mail with their loved ones. The American Red Cross is attempting to forward by this route small packets containing concentrated vitamins and medicines of a sort which are thought to be scarce in the Far East. We have as yet no assurance that supplies so sent will reach those for whom intended. However, the fact that this method of shipment is being attempted will, I think, demonstrate that every possible means is being explored by which assistance, great or small, can be brought to our nationals in Japanese custody.

Certain other proposals for the relief of our people in Japanese custody, both prisoners of war and civilians, are receiving the active attention of responsible officials of the Government. As some of these involve the security of our military forces in the Far East, they cannot yet be made public; others, which are awaiting the Japanese Government's reply, could be jeopardized by premature publicity.

I assure you that the welfare of American nationals in Japanese hands is given and will continue to receive personal attention by the highest ranking officers of the Department of State and other interested departments of this Government. I have followed closely all developments in this situation and have particularly charged one of the Assistant Secretaries of State with the responsibility for taking all possible steps to do whatever can be done to ameliorate the conditions under which American nationals are detained in the Far East and to arrange for the repatriation of those whose release can be effected. He works in close collaboration with the Director and Deputy Director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs and the chiefs of the Division of Japanese Affairs, the Division of Philippine Affairs, and the Special War Problems Division, as well as with the chiefs of other interested divisions of the Department and other agencies of the Government and the American Red Cross. This whole problem is one of the chief preoccupations of the Inter-Departmental Boards on Prisoners of War and Civilian Internees, on which the War and Navy Departments and the Departments of State and Justice are represented by high-ranking officers. Moreover, the President has taken a deep personal interest in this matter and has directed that all possible assistance be provided for Americans in Japanese custody.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

C. I. O. Unions and Communist Fronts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Westbrook Pegler in regard to C. I. O. unions and Communist fronts.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

NEW YORK, August 29.—Reporters in France tell of the execution of French women and men who were deemed to have collaborated with the Nazis and of women shorn as a mark of disgrace. The trials must have been informal and emotional, and there runs through the dispatches a strong suggestion that the Communists of France now are sitting as judges of patriotism to a country which they themselves betrayed in the days of the phony war and on down to the fall.

In the Herald Tribune, John Chabot Smith, writing from Marseille, says the French Forces of the Interior, after seizing a town, install a local government consisting of representatives from each of the six principal political groups, including the Communists.

The Communists in France, like the Nazis, are political fanatics. They have so much in common that before the war some American writers were calling the Nazis brown Bolsheviks. It is a fact that they were traitors to France and would have opened the gates from the inside to let the Nazis in without a fight, just as the Communists in the United States did all they could to keep this country unarmed and helpless until June 1941. President Roosevelt, himself, flatly accused the American Communists of this when he sent the Regular Army to Inglewood, Calif., to drive their terrorists from the gates of one of our most important airplane factories so that Americans could get to their jobs.

To refresh our memory of the conduct of the American Communists during that time we may refer to the files of some of the house organs of the C. I. O. unions which were then, and remain today, Communist fronts, controlled by clever and indefatigable Communist minorities. The Daily Worker is another reliable reference.

The Communists in France were worse than useless in the French Army facing the Germans. They not only wouldn't fight the Nazis, but they made more ghastly the desperate position of those Frenchmen who did fight and many of whom died. They were saboteurs in the factories and ports and collaborationists in far more deadly and tragic ways while there was still a chance of survival than those who, during the long dark night since the fall, lost hope of rescue and simply submitted.

The Communists were active, aggressive traitors who stabbed their own country in the back just as surely as Mussolini did, and only after the foul deed was done and the Nazis were in, suddenly turned patriots because Russia, their spiritual homeland, was in danger. Their purpose was not to rescue France but to help Russia by harassing the Nazis in France.

That such people should now be able to hound and condemn and execute others, even though some of the accused actually were traitors, is a hideous irony and an injustice to the American and British fighters who drove the Germans out. For these American and British soldiers, too, were betrayed by the Communists and now find French Communists exploiting their victory.

It will not be so, apparently, but surely these traitors, too, should be called to trial. Instead we find them participating in the control of the nation they helped the Nazis to humiliate and torture.

Excerpts From Speeches Delivered by Hon. Alexander Wiley, of Wisconsin, on the Subject of Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from speeches delivered by me from 1939 to 1944, inclusive, on the subject of preparedness, together with editorial comment thereon.

There being no objection, the excerpts and editorial comment were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 1, 1939, volume 84, part 2, page 2078:

"I shall vote for adequate defense. Are we in voting this money making provision so that every dollar of it will go into preparedness? There are so many places where money is needed to help and encourage and influence constructively the life of our people that we cannot afford to waste the money which is to be appropriated. We must see that no exorbitant profits or graft are permitted."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 7, 1939, volume 84, part 4, page 3946:

"Today I am presenting a measure to restore the cut in prevailing tariff rates on zinc ores and slab zinc. * * * It is desirable that attention be directed to the prevailing zinc tariff rates because it is more than possible that they constitute a genuine menace to the American zinc industry and its employees; also this menace, with its resultant shut-downs, will seriously curtail production of a product vital to national defense."

On October 7, 1939, I discussed with Senator Schwellenbach the exportation of scrap iron and steel from this country. Opposed the exportation on the following grounds: (1) because it had an inflationary effect on our domestic prices; (2) because it made it possible for Japan to procure her armament requirements from American scrap.

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 9, 1940, volume 86, part 6, page 5821:

"There are rumors in and out of the Capitol relating to the sufficiency and adequacy of America's equipment for self-defense in this great hour. What have we in the way of raw materials? Are we spending our resources? Certainly if we need our raw materials adequately to prepare ourselves, none of them should be shipped to any other nation."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 16, 1940, volume 86, part 6, page 6226:

"I do object to diverting America's attention from the challenge of the hour—I mean the need for immediate preparedness, preparedness to protect our own, but not to spend our resources in brawls on other continents. * * * What are we preparing against? The answer must be that we are preparing against war within and war without, so that war will not reach our shores. * * * That brings up the matter of mental defense, something for which we cannot legislate, but something for which each citizen must prepare himself. He must not let hysteria or loose and irrational thinking determine his course, or the course of the Nation."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 11, 1940, volume 86, part 7, page 7919:

"I believe everyone agrees that today we must direct our attention to this phase of our preparedness program—accumulating so-called strategic and critical materials."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 23, 1940, volume 86, part 10, page 10798:

"It is conceded that it is imperative to get our national forces built up. That does not mean simply more ships of the same kind. No; it means, if we are to have a preparedness program, that America must use its head. We do not want more ships of the old type. We want our present ships made more immune to attack from torpedoes, submarines, and airplane bombs. It may mean the creating of a new type of ship.

"Recently I took the matter up with the Secretary of the Navy, Colonel Knox, of building on the Great Lakes a great program of shipbuilding, whereby America would create an independent arm of the Navy—a mosquito fleet—if you please. We could build these small torpedo boats—they are only 70 to 100 feet long—we could build a hundred or more of them for the cost of a battleship. In the Battle of Britain, which is to come, we may find new lessons. But when we speak about a two-ocean Navy, we talk of prospects 5 and 6 years from now. We could build in 6 months to a year 5,000 of these small torpedo boats by taking over the shipyards on the Great Lakes, and those boats could protect every harbor on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. Why? Because they are speedy. We could improve the present design. They carry torpedoes. Some of them go at the rate of 70 to 90 miles an hour. They have antiaircraft protection. The sinking of one of these small boats would mean the loss simply of a complement of a few men. These boats are built for attack. They could proceed 500 miles out to sea. They could tear out from behind warships. They could supplement our submarines, they could supplement the air force, and they would give us the protection which America wants now.

"For a year and a half now I have pressed this matter upon the Navy Department. I took it up about a year and a half ago with Admiral Land, as I recall, and I persisted in it. I hope to have talks with Mr. Knudsen and others in relation to that subject. We do not always have to look to Germany to have the most advanced step. Germany has the blitzkrieg. We have intuition here. We have invention here. We have brains here. Let America use these qualities. Let America awake and lead the world—not simply be a follower.

"In this challenging period let us arouse all America to contribute to the preparedness program."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 4, 1941, volume 87, part 2, page 1714:

"On the 14th of February 1941 I introduced a resolution that 'the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors, and that the Secretary of State and his Under Secretaries be requested to attend to discuss the eastern situation and other related matters with the Senate.'

"I wanted to find out something about our situation in the world. What did I want to find out?

"(a) What are our commitments in the Far East? Putting it bluntly, are we going to step in if Japan continues to rape the East as Adolf Hitler has raped Europe? She has let it be known now that she wants all of Oceania.

"(b) What is the condition of our fleet, especially its coordinating air arm? Is it like the Russian Fleet was in the Japanese war? I wanted to know whether or not our fleet had a coordinating air arm, such as the world has recently demonstrated every fleet must have.

"(c) What is our military position and our condition in the Philippines? Have we sufficient airplanes there? Are we ready for any eventuality?

"(d) If a commitment exists, what about the Dutch ability, the ability of Britain to cooperate, and what about the French in the Far East?

"(e) Where do we stand in relation to Europe? How much are we expected to contribute in ships, planes, and material when Hitler shoots his major effort?"

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1941, volume 87, part 3, page 2962:

"I am hoping and praying that we will not get into this world war but I cannot close my eyes to the fact that we are at the present time considerably in it. We are a partner with Britain in many ways. America has changed her course from isolation to intervention and is not simply meddling but has become an active participant in European affairs, diplomatically and economically, and has taken sides in this conflict by opening up her shipyards for Britain, furnishing Britain equipment, airplanes, and ships, and now the Government will seize the ships of the Axis Powers in our ports; it has thrown neutrality out of the window and is now contemplating convoying British ships.

"I am speaking for the pilots of America who will be fighting your battle and mine if we become involved in war. Are we building inferior fighting planes? If our men are to do any fighting, they are entitled to the best ships America can produce."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 19, 1941, volume 87, part 12, page A2947:

"The Nation's job is essentially preparedness to meet any military threat, any economic war, or any ideological battle."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 10, 1941, volume 87, part 12, page A3347:

"I cannot favor any acts by the United States Government which are an immediate invitation to involvement. * * * I think that one of the best guarantees that America can have for peace is an efficient, highly mobile army with a coordinating air arm and an unparalleled navy with a coordinating air arm."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 7, 1941, volume 87, part 6, page 6850:

"All America agrees that there is a great need for a reasonable, sensible defense program. All America is ready to dig down and pay its share of the defense program * * * between 80 and 85 percent of our people have indicated clearly that they don't want the managers of Government to commit any overt act which would precipitate this country into war. In my opinion, the interventionists do not rate over 1 percent in this country in number. The strict isolationists probably do not rate over 5 percent in number in this country. In between these two classes is the great Nation of American people who are thinking things through * * * all of them are in favor of adequate defense * * * they want this country to remain safe and free and at peace. This group is also conscious of the fact that other nations that wanted to remain safe and at peace and free have been overrun and conquered. They know that if any other nation commits an overt act of war against this land, we shall have unity. We shall have 131,000,000 people rising up en masse to defend this land."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 30, 1941, volume 87, part 8, pages 8341–8342 (speaking on the resolution to arm American merchant vessels):

"We are unprepared for war. We must do everything we can to postpone any military conflict until we are prepared. * * * We have no choice. Unless war is thrust upon us by force of circumstance, we cannot court an unprepared involvement which would send our inadequately trained boys to a slaughter of the innocents. Because I believe we are unprepared I have opposed each and every measure which appeared to be directed toward an unwarranted involvement, and I shall continue to oppose measures looking toward an unwarranted involvement."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 30, 1941, volume 87, part 8, page 8346:

"Armed merchantmen have been conclusively shown to be ineffective by our experience in the last World War * * * under international law an armed merchantman has the status of a warship and is subject to attack without warning."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 30, 1941, volume 87, part 8, page 8348:

"I have a feeling that if the pending joint resolution (repealing the Neutrality Act of 1935) is passed, it means war. In my opposition to the other steps taken by the administration, I have never made that statement. I have a feeling nearing conviction that if this joint resolution becomes the law of the land and the President puts it into execution, your country and mine will be engaged in war."

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 2, 1942, volume 88, part 8, page A319:

"I supported appropriations for more than $800,000,000 in 1939; more than eight billion in 1940. (That includes every military and naval appropriation presented to the Senate.) And in 1941 I supported defense appropriations of more than thirty-two billion."

EDITORIAL COMMENT

[Excerpt from editorial from the Christian Science Monitor, September 24, 1942, appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 6, 1942, vol. 88, pt. 10, pp. A3585–A3586]

The short speech which Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin, delivered on the floor of the Senate a few days ago is certain to grow in significance.

In it Senator WILEY advanced the most important, constructive, and forward-looking suggestion in behalf of the future peace which has come from Congress since the United States formally entered the war. He proposed that President Roosevelt be invited to join with the Senate in forming a foreign relations advisory committee. * * * If this be isolationism, then the internationalists could well embrace it. But this is not isolationism; it is the voice of constructive, midwestern leadership which is awake, alert, and concerned that the United States shall neglect no step which will produce a peace-secured world as the only guaranty of a peace-secured America.

[From the Washington Post of July 1943]

Ten months before Pearl Harbor Senator WILEY introduced another resolution asking the Secretary of State to report in executive session to the Senate on the threat of war in the Far East and our preparations to meet it. At that time the State Department knew that war in the Pacific was rapidly approaching. But the resolution was pigeonholed. The Senate did not get the information sought. No adequate preparations to meet an attack were made. The United States was humiliated at Pearl Harbor, and a great sacrifice of human life will be necessary to regain what we have lost in the Far East. No one can say with assurance how the situation would have been changed if the information in the hands of the State Department had been conveyed to key Members of Congress. This much, however, is certain: The withholding of such information makes it impossible for the representatives of the people to act intelligently in the face of a global crisis.

[From the Kenosha (Wis.) Evening News of February 29, 1944]

Long before the Federal Government opened up low-grade zinc mines by paying a differential Senator WILEY made the suggestion to do so. Over 2 years before the Government began to utilize shipyards on the Lakes he asked the Navy and the Maritime Commission to do this very thing, suggesting the need for the building of corvette-type boats. If his suggestion had been followed earlier it would have saved 700 oil tankers, eased the oil rationing, and put the solution of that problem months ahead.

[From the Tribune and Legal News, Saginaw, Mich., of August 11, 1944]

SENATOR WILEY'S FORESIGHT

People in Washington can't get over the fact that American Ambassador Grew reported on the dangers of an attack from Japan to the Department of State long before Pearl Harbor.

And Washington remembers that Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin, had an inkling that things were in a bad way in the Pacific, and that he introduced a resolution nearly a year before Pearl Harbor asking the Secretary of State to appear before the Senate in executive session and make a report on the situation in the Pacific. It has been suggested that had this WILEY "first" resolution been adopted that the Japs might not have been able to get away with the attack on Pearl Harbor.

It also appears that Senator WILEY has been "first" in looking ahead most of the time during the 6 years in which he has been in the Senate. At least he was the first person to recommend to the Secretary of the Navy and the Maritime Commission that shipyards be constructed in the Great Lakes area and utilized to help produce American ships. Today our Great Lakes areas stand out at the "peak" among the regions where big things are done to win the war.

War Refugees as Immigrants

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 15), 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "War Refugees as Immigrants," published in the Colorado Springs Gazette of August 19, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR REFUGEES AS IMMIGRANTS

Through the action of the President, a thousand war refugees have been brought from Europe and established in a camp in New York where they will be maintained for the duration. Normally, it would seem, marked victims of Nazi oppression, escaping, would be cared for in Italy or north Africa. Mr. Roosevelt has explained that he ordered them brought here as a symbol of America's willingness to assume a fair share of responsibility for such people. If, after all this country has done in the last 5 years, and continues to do, anybody needs such evidence, it is indeed, a strange world.

What is of particular moment is the problem presented by the presence of these WAR refugees and the means by which they were brought into the country. For the President, in directing their admittance, acted in violation of the immigration laws, and it seems inevitable that sooner or later most, if not all, of those brought here will seek immigrant status.

The problem is one of immigration policy and whether that which we have followed since the last war is to be torn down by war emotionalism and sentimentalism. Certainly when war ends there will be a rush of Europeans seeking admittance to this country. That WAS the experience last time and, coupled with the earlier experience with hyphenates, it prompted the first steps toward rigidly controlled immigration.

America had theretofore been a haven of refuge and a land of opportunity. Matured, it can no longer be so pictured with justice to those who have built it. The immigrant now seeks equal standing in a going concern. That is why the undeveloped lands of the world, even when rich in natural resource, offer no attraction. There the effort would have to start with spade work. Here a prosperous society is already in being.

If that society is to be maintained, free and independent and economically sound, it must be by a reasonably homogenous people; at least, a people sharing common ideals. The American ideal is held nowhere else in the world, nor much understood, however, what it has produced may be envied, and if it is to be maintained here the addition to population through immigration must be regulated both by selection and by the time factor involved in assimilation.

The country, in short, can take in no more than it can digest.

There is unbounded sympathy for Europeans who are suffering and will continue to suffer for years in consequence of war. The American people will do all they can to help alleviate that suffering. The most they can do will fall short of what is desired. Sympathy will demand the opening of immigration gates to accommodate as many as possible here. Cold reason says we shall thereby weaken ourselves without offering any solution of the broad problem. Reason should prevail.

Slaughter by Nazis of Polish People

OF

HON. EARL R. LEWIS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, this morning's newspapers contain the story of the slaughter by the Nazis of 6,000,000 Polish people since the German Army first invaded Poland, and yesterday's papers contained the story of the removal of 150,000 Poles from the city of Warsaw to the neighboring suburban area of Pruszkow, and also at Majdanek, near Lublin, where the Nazis have established "wholesale slaughter camps." The newspaper accounts are as follows:

[From the Washington Star of August 30, 1944]

GERMANS ON TRIAL CONFESS SEEING WHOLESALE SLAUGHTER

(By Daniel De Luce)

LUBLIN, POLAND, August 17 (delayed).—Four German prisoners of war stood with a bored air in front of a Russian-Polish atrocities commission here tonight and told their stories of Majdanek, perhaps the greatest horror in Nazi Europe.

In curt phrases, they asserted that men, women, and children of 22 nationalities had been gassed, hanged, shot, burned, drugged, or starved to death in the 3 years of the operation of the Majdanek barbed-wire-enclosed encampment in a rolling meadowland at the edge of Lublin. Russians and Poles have estimated that it received more than half a million persons doomed to extermination.

Majdanek is a ghastly fantasy. It was established for murder on a vast but methodical scale. Until a group of American and British correspondents visited it today—with its six concrete vaults for execution by cyanide or carbon monoxide gas, its open-air crematorium surrounded with skeletons, its mounds of human ashes mixed with manure for fertilizing cabbage patches, and its overflow burial ground in a pine woods carpeted with decaying bodies—most of these newspapermen could not even begin to imagine the proportions of its frightfulness.

Tonight, with our clothes still reeking of the dead, we sat in a stuffy Lublin courtroom while three German SS (Elite Guard) officers and one German civilian renegade spoke indifferently of Majdanek's scenes of slaughter and blamed all on "orders from above."

N. A. Stalb, a blond, 6-foot German butcher, arrested in 1939 for selling meat in the black market, told in a clear, strong voice of his incarceration in Majdanek during which he once became a member of the barracks police detail.

"I have seen a tractor haul as many as 400 corpses at one time from the bath and disinfection house to the ovens on the hill," he said. "One day I saw the bodies of 157 Polish children who had been gassed. Another time I saw a group of Polish women marched up a hill to be shot to save the trouble of gassing them. They were ordered to disrobe. One refused—a girl about 28 to 29. Two men tied her hands and legs, put her on a steel stretcher, and thrust her alive into the white-hot oven."

"WE COULDN'T PROTEST"

Hermann Vogel, 42, an SS group leader from Mühlheim, stared ahead with a set face as he told of shipping 18 carloads of clothing to Germany from the Majdanek warehouse he supervised.

"Yes; all this clothing, even babies' garments, belonged to those executed," he said. "I have seen groups of 120 to 150 persons taken to the gashouse in the evening and their bodies stacked outside the next morning. Yes; I knew children were murdered, but what could we small people in the SS do? We couldn't protest."

SS Komandofuehrer Theodore Schoelen, 40, in charge of clothing collection at the shower room adjoining the gas chambers, claimed he never saw an execution—only corpses afterward. He admitted remembering November 3, 1943, when, according to the camp records, 18,400 prisoners received "special treatment" which reduced the number of camp inmates by that number.

"It was an order from above, perhaps direct from Berlin," he said. "The wireless played Strauss waltzes through the camp loudspeakers all that day and most of us were told to stay in barracks. I know nothing more about it. I always gave bread and cigarettes to the prisoners."

SS Obersturmfuehrer Anton Ternes, a frog-faced man who handled Majdanek's finances, proudly referred to his age, 50, and his lieutenancy in the last war and then declared that the mass slaughter of November 3 netted little jewelry or other valuables.

"The camp physicians told me as many as 300 children were killed in a single day," he said. "I couldn't understand the systematic killing. I told my wife when I went home on furlough about it and she said: 'God will punish the German people for the crimes they do.' "

The Russian-Polish commission said the following facts had been adduced from seized documents, from testimony of the German personnel, and of surviving inmates, such as the French Communist, Fisherman Corenten Ledu, of Brittany:

Majdanek housed from 30,000 to 40,000 prisoners, but the turn-over in 3 years probably exceeded 600,000.

The gas chambers were sufficient to kill 2,000 in less than 7 minutes. The crematory ovens handled 1,900 corpses in a 24-hour period.

The majority of the dead were Soviet war prisoners, Poles, and Jews, but every country in Europe was represented, also China.

[From the Washington Times-Herald of August 29, 1944]

NAZIS TO SLAY 150,000 POLES, OFFICIAL SAYS IN PLEA FOR HELP

Poland's exile government appealed to the United States yesterday in an attempt to prevent the Germans from slaughtering 150,000 Polish men, women, and children who have been concentrated in a small town 15 miles southwest of Warsaw.

Polish Ambassador Jan Ciechanowski presented a formal note to the State Department, declaring that the 150,000 civilians were recently moved out of Warsaw and deported to a wholesale slaughter camp in the suburbs of Pruszkow.

"They are being starved, tortured, entirely deprived of food and water, and are facing inevitable death," the envoy's note said.

"Untold scenes of horror in the Pruszkow camp are beyond description. It is obviously the aim of the Germans to bring about the extermination of this population within the next few days.

"The Polish Government urgently appeals to the government of the Allied Nations and to the entire civilized world to do all that is possible to prevent the perpetration of this final act of German barbarity, unprecedented in history.

"Only the immediate intervention of the Vatican, of the Allied and neutral powers, of the International Red Cross supported by the weight of the indignation of all free democratic public opinion may still stop the Germans from carrying out their heinous design of mass slaughter of defenseless and innocent civilians."

The Polish note said the extermination of these citizens of Warsaw appears to be a German attempt at retaliation for the fact the Polish home army started an uprising in the capital on August 1.

If something is not done immediately these heroic people will be completely wiped out before it is possible for the Russian Armies to get through the Nazi lines defending Warsaw.

From time to time we have heard that American lend-lease weapons and other materials of war are not being furnished to General Bor, commander of the Polish underground armies in Warsaw. It has been stated in the public press that it is entirely possible to fly arms into Warsaw by American and British Army planes and supply the Polish citizenry of that city with the means to defend themselves but that for some reason that has not been done. Mr. Speaker, I can conceive of no reason why we should not supply lend-lease weapons to the Polish people as we supply them to any of the others of our allies. Polish soldiers are fighting on all the battle fronts of the world in the Allied cause and are fighting heroically. At Cassino, in Italy, we are told that three out of every four Polish soldiers who made the attack on that heavily defended fighting front were killed. When the British took Tobruk and held it, it was Polish soldiers in the service of the British who were largely responsible for that feat. Poland, Mr. Speaker, has suffered as no other Allied nation has suffered in this war and I believe it is the duty of this Congress to demand that our responsible officials who have the authority to designate where the lend-lease weapons shall go shall send them immediately to the underground army of Poland and I am sure if that is done the lives of many Allied soldiers now fighting in that country will be spared because the Polish underground army, properly armed, will became a tremendous power for the destruction of our common enemy.

In the name of humanity and everything that Christian people hold dear, let us spare no means to go to the rescue of the heroic Polish people.

Appropriations for W. P. A., C. C. C., and N. Y. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT L. RODGERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. RODGERS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include some figures furnished by the Appropriations Committee with reference to the total appropriations or allocations for W. P. A., C. C. C., and N. Y. A.:

Appropriations or allocations for W. P. A.

United States Writer Sees Horror of Nazi Death Camp—Most Terrible Place on Earth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following news article which appeared in the Detroit Free Press of August 30, 1944, written by W. H. Lawrence, of the New York Times foreign service:

UNITED STATES WRITER SEES HORROR OF NAZI DEATH CAMP—MOST TERRIBLE PLACE ON EARTH—1,500,000 KILLED IN LAST 3 YEARS AT GERMANS' LUBLIN FURNACES

(By W. H. Lawrence)

LUBLIN, POLAND.—I have just seen the most terrible place on the face of the earth—the German concentration camp at Majdanek, which was a veritable river of blood.

It is estimated by Soviet and Polish authorities that 1,500,000 persons from nearly every country in Europe have died there in the last 3 years.

I have been all through the camp inspecting its hermetically sealed gas chambers in which persons were asphyxiated and its battered fire furnaces in which persons were cremated.

I have talked with German officers attached to the camp who admitted quite frankly that it was a highly systemized place for annihilation.

I have seen skeletons of bodies the Germans did not have time to burn before the Red Army swept into Lublin on July 23.

And I have seen much evidence of bone ash still in the furnaces and piled up beside them ready to be taken to a nearby field as fertilizer for cabbages.

I have been at Krempitski, 10 miles east, where I saw three of the 10 opened mass graves and looked upon 368 partially decomposed bodies of men, women, and children who had been executed individually in a variety of cruel, horrible means. In this forest alone, the authorities estimate there are more than 300,000 bodies.

It is impossible for this correspondent to state with certainty how many persons the Germans killed here. Many bodies unquestionably were burned and not nearly all of the graves in this vicinity had been opened by the time I visited the scene.

But I have been in a wooden warehouse at the camp approximately 150 feet long in which I walked across literally tens of thousands of shoes spread across the floor like grain in a half-filled elevator.

Here I saw shoes of children as young as 1 year old. There were shoes of young and old men or women. Those I saw were all in bad shape—since the Germans not only used the camp to exterminate people but also as a means of obtaining clothing for the German people.

I have questioned a German officer, Herman Vogel, 42, of Milheim, who admitted that as head of the clothing barracks he had supervised the shipment of 18 freight car loads of clothing to Germany during a 2-month period.

He knew, he said, that it came from the bodies of persons who had been killed at Majdanek.

This is a place which must be seen to be believed.

But I have looked inside furnaces and have handled the huge steel stretcher on which bodies were loaded into a stove, five in each furnace—not unlike the huge instrument by which bakers remove bread pans from an oven after baking.

After inspection of Majdanek I am now prepared to believe any story of German atrocities no matter how savage, cruel, and depraved.

I was given an opportunity to sit with the special mixed Soviet-Polish Atrocities Investigation Commission, headed by Vice President Witos, of Poland, and to question six witnesses.

For the correspondents the commission's prosecutor, Christians, a Pole, summed up the evidence taken by the commission. He said it had decided that these Germans bore the main responsibility for the crimes committed at Majdanek and in Krempeitski Forest:

General Globcnik, Gestapo and SS chief of the Lublin district.

Governor Wendler, of the Lublin district, described as a distant relative of Heinrich Himmler.

Former Governor Zoerner, of the Lublin district.

Lisske, who had charge of all concentration camps in the Lublin district.

General Weiss, who was in charge of the Majdanek camp.

Company Commander Anton Tumann, who at one time had charge of Majdanek.

Mussfeld, who was in charge of the crematorium.

Klopmann, who was chief of the German political department of the Lublin district.

It is impossible in the space here availbale to relate the details, but here is the story as it came from the lips of a German. He had been a prisoner in Majdenek and was left by the retreating Germans. He was Hans Staub, 31, who had been imprisoned for engaging in black-market meat operations in Germany.

Despite German orders that prisoners were to keep away from the crematorium area, he managed to slip inside the brick fence one day. He secreted himself at about the time a truck loaded with approximately a dozen people drove up.

Among them was a Polish woman he estimated to be 28 or 29 years old. The prisoners were ordered to alight from the truck and undress. One woman refused, and this enraged Mussfeld, who beat her. She screamed, and Mussfeld lost his temper, shouting, "I will burn you alive."

According to Staub, Mussfeld then directed attendants to grab the woman and bind her arms and legs.

They then threw her on the iron stretcher still clothed and shoved her body into the oven.

"I heard one loud scream, saw her hair flame and then she disappeared into the furnace," Staub said.

According to several witnesses the peak death production day for Majdanek was November 3, 1943, when the Germans executed a total of 18,000 to 20,000 prisoners.

Majdanek is located about two kilometers from the middle of Lublin on the high road from Chelm to Crakow. As one approaches one gets a view of the concentration camp almost identical with those depicted by American motion pictures.

The whole camp covered an area of 670 acres.

As we entered the camp the first place at which we stopped was the reception center. Here Jews, Poles, Russians and in fact, representatives of a total of 22 nationalities entered.

Sometimes they went directly into the next room which was hermetically sealed with apertures in its roof. Down the way the Germans threw in opened cans of "zyklon B" poison gas consisting of prussic acid crystals which were a light-blue chalky substance. This produced death quickly.

Other prisoners were kept for long periods of time. The average, we were told, was about 6 weeks.

About 1 mile from the gas chambers was a huge crematorium built of brick.

We were told it took 15 minutes to fill each furnace and about 10 to 12 minutes for the bodies to burn. It was estimated that this battery of furnaces had a capacity of 1,900 bodies per day.

This is Majdanek as I saw it.

The Passing of a Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include an editorial from the Daily Times published at Mamaroneck, N. Y., Monday, August 28, 1944, titled "The Passing of a Party":

THE PASSING OF A PARTY

Should Franklin D. Roosevelt be reelected to a fourth term it is fair to predict that his very success on the ticket technically labeled Democratic will mean the passing of that party as it has been known for generations to American voters. For the forces which are most active in his behalf and to whom he will owe the greatest gratitude in event of victory at the November polls are not those which have made the Democratic Party as it has been known in the past, but others with widely different ideologies.

There have been Presidential campaigns before in American history wherein all the radical and subversive elements of the Nation were lined up behind one candidate. But never before have we witnessed not only the united support of one candidate by such elements, but an open, vigorous effort by these same elements to capture that party.

It is no secret that the C. I. O. and the Communist-minded leaders of some organized unions were the first to start the ball rolling for a fourth term for Franklin D. Roosevelt. It was equally apparent at the recent Democratic National Convention, in the backstairs manipulation of the Vice Presidential nomination, including the blackballing of James F. Byrnes, that these elements held the balance of power in that convention. And it should be just as clear that in the event of success of the Roosevelt-Truman ticket on November 7, it will be these same elements which will assume open control of what has now for 152 years been the Democratic Party, the oldest continuously existing political instrumentality in the United States.

Those elements may best be visualized as the Russian-born Sidney Hillman, his C. I. O. Political Action Committee, the affiliated Communist-controlled American Labor Party, variegated and assorted radical groups friendly to the principles enunciated by such leaders and contributors to their vast campaign funds, linked with some three and one-half million self-perpetuating pay-roll patriots of the Federal bureaus. Where in that group can be found Democrats as they were known under Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, Woodrow Wilson, or Alfred E. Smith?

These would-be captors of the Democratic Party are smart, they are vigorous, they are ambitious. Even here in the rock-ribbed Republicanism of Westchester they are steadily making their strength felt, as revealed recently in their successful union-led demands for higher war bonuses and pay for county employees and in grass-roots registration campaigns for their potential voters. Make no mistake about it, just so surely as to the victors belong the spoils in any election, so in this campaign a victory for the Roosevelt-Truman ticket in November will spell the conquest of the Democratic Party by the elements most active in the campaign.

Those true Democrats who oppose this seizure from within of a party whose cherished principles have long been far different from policies now enunciated by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee are naturally timid and hesitant in such opposition. They resent justifiably the appellation thrown at them of "Roosevelt haters" and reactionaries; properly they shy from charges of having selfish, sinister motives and of seeing nightmares in the daytime. But unless they make such opposition effective they will, as surely as election brings a Roosevelt-Truman victory, find their party has been taken from them and themselves bodily evacuated much in the fashion of Sewell Avery of Montgomery Ward.

That is the issue which will come before honest-to-goodness Democrats in this campaign. Here in Westchester we ask that such Democrats consider carefully and most seriously the impact upon their own party of success of this ticket they are asked to support. Is their duty that of loyalty to Roosevelt and Truman or to the party which has served the Nation so long and up to now so honorably, a party which through malignant masquerade and Machiavellian manipulation is now summoned to suicide?

The Late Second Lt. William J. Bucklin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a letter that was written by Second Lt. William J. Bucklin and was mailed from Camp Benning, Ga., on November 24, 1943. Susan, not quite 4 years of age, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Francis G. Martineau, of 105 High Service Avenue, North Providence, R. I.

Lieutenant Bucklin was the son of Col. and Mrs. John G. Bucklin, of 11 Leah Street, North Providence, R. I. He attended Henry Barnard School and graduated from Classical High School, Providence. He was a member of North Providence Troop of Boy Scouts prior to entering college.

He received the degree of bachelor of science in mechanical engineering from Rhode Island State College in September 1943. At college he was a captain in the R. O. T. C., a member of the Honor Society, of Scabbard and Blade, and of the Newman Club. He contributed articles to the Beacon and the Rhode Island Review, and was editor of the latter publication in 1943 and wrote the leading editorial entitled "On a Darkling Plain"—which was a plea for preparation for the peace following an Allied victory. He also wrote an essay entitled "Let us see the Stars."

Upon receiving his commission at Camp Benning he was sent to Camp McCoy, Wis. He died on August 11, 1944, from an accidental gunshot wound received in line of duty, at Camp McCoy. At the time of his death he was assigned as cannon battalion leader to Company C, Four Hundred and Seventeenth Infantry Regiment, Seventy-sixth Infantry.

It was my privilege to appoint this young man, after examination, as first alternate to the Naval Academy at Annapolis in 1942. He was certified by the academy, but was subsequently selected for officers' training, and upon receiving his degree from Rhode Island State College went to Camp Benning.

Here is a boy who has given the last full measure of devotion to his country's cause. Here is a young man, on the threshold of a brilliant career, who has left us to go on to the Valhalla where all great warriors must meet. This letter has come out of the depths of his soul. It is a pledge that the Nation need have no concern for its destiny when this next generation shall have taken over. It is a promise of America's future greatness.

The letter referred to follows:

DEAR SUSAN: Although you're not quite old enough to read these lines all by yourself, much less understand them, I am writing you a love letter. It is undoubtedly your first one, and for that I'm glad.

There will be many more from other boys as you grow older, for you have learned from wise parents to hold beauty in your heart. When beauty is in the heart, it smiles in those smiling eyes of yours and in your dimpled chin, and you spread cheer and happiness to others.

Happiness is the only thing worth striving for in this crazy life, Susan, and that's why I'm writing this letter. You still live in a world which exists largely in your own mind, and you don't realize completely what has happened to this world about you. I'm just that much older than you that I have been forced to think about this funny ball of earth which is running wild.

Everyone, as he grows up, must find ideals to live for. In the ultimate analysis, this life is but a preparation for a better life, but while on earth, we must organize our mortal lives along a more prosaic pattern of ideals. I tell you this because you have given me a great part of my ideals, or at least you have crystallized them.

Perhaps this is a war of four freedoms for all mankind, but knowing a little of the way men are intrinsically selfish and apt to forget the further goal once an immediate victory is won, I sadly dismiss such world-wide ideals as futile. And so, while debating why I am about to risk a thing which most men seem to value above all else, I pictured you.

You, a little girl with a twinkling eye that sees nothing but good on earth, with a capacity for unselfish affection that would make a prince of the meanest pauper. Yes, Susan dear, I think of those fragile yet firm little hands that held mine in a grasp of openhearted friendship—I think of a heart that offers for every joy taken, the present of a thousand in return. And so Susan, when I have to decide if I am going to fight for something worth fighting for, I think of you.

Then my heart feels good, and clean inside, for I am exalted in believing that I fight for the right of you and other children like you to grow up the way you are now—unworried, happy and without a care. If I can help keep you as you are, it is worth the price.

How or why this mess started is of no concern to me now. My ambition is to help clean it up as quickly as possible. The more distant future may be a dark cloud, not yet a part of your life, but the little people about us can insure that rainbows are always in the skies, if they but learn to live as you live.

So Susan darling, stay in your happy ignorance as long as you can. The dreams you dream are the realest things in life. It is never too late nor inopportune to have them, but to keep mine real and vital, I give them to you to hold 'till happier days.

Take care of them 'till I come home. With love,

BILL.

Representative Clare Boothe Luce, of Connecticut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. D. LANE POWERS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the speech made by Mr. John B. Napolitano, on August 9, 1944, in which he seconded the nomination of my colleague and friend, Mrs. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE, for reelection in the Fourth Congressional District of Connecticut. It follows:

I am a labor man. I am a shop steward of Bridgeport General Electric Local 203, United Radio and Machine Workers of America, C. I. O. My future is the future of organized labor, and I want organized labor to have a real chance in this country—a chance to hold on to its past gains and to continue to progress.

Naturally, I believe organized labor has a great deal at stake in the next election, but I do not think for 1 minute that labor's whole future is tied up in the present administration or in the New Deal.

I believe that labor's best chances now and always lies in the election or reelection of its tested and proven friends.

Nearly 2 years ago, when CLARE BOOTHE LUCE ran for Congress from the fourth district, many honest and sincere labor men were frankly skeptical. True, she had said repeatedly in campaign speeches that she was a friend of labor, that she was in favor of all the social gains labor had made and that she hoped some of these gains, such as the Wagner Act, would be extended by becoming part of the law of our own State.

But what I wanted to know and what other labor men asked was: "Is Mrs. LUCE sincere or is this just campaign oratory? Does she mean this or is she just kidding us along to pick up a few votes? What will she do when some anti-labor legislation comes up in Congress? Will she keep her word to us then?"

Well, as you all know, Mrs. LUCE was elected, and just 5 months, almost to the day, after she went to Congress a piece of prime grade anti-labor legislation came up on the floor of the House. I refer, of course, to the famous Smith-Connally Anti-Strike bill. It was a time when the whole country seemed down on organized labor because of the coal strikes. It was a time when many of labor's long-time friends were deserting our cause.

Plenty of pressure was being put on Congress to pass this bill, and plenty of Congressmen and Senators were yielding to that pressure. But our Representative, Mrs. LUCE, stuck by her word, resisted the pressure, and voted against the Smith-Connally bill. The bill passed, as you know, and was vetoed by the President. When it came back to the House Mrs. LUCE was paired to sustain the President's veto.

A great deal of other legislation of importance to labor has come before the Seventy-eighth Congress. For instance, there was the Carlson bill for current payment of income tax, which embodied the principles of the Ruml plan. Labor was opposed to the Carlson bill because it conferred a windfall on the rich and no comparative benefit on the ordinary workingman. Again the pressure for passage of this bill was enormous, perhaps chiefly because the plan was not clearly understood by the general public. Again Mrs. LUCE voted according to her conscience and her campaign pledges by consistently opposing the Carlson bill with its windfalls.

She paired against the Hobbs bill, which put organized labor in the same category as organized crime. She voted against appropriating money for another Dies committee witch hunt. She supported the Monroney amendment to the antisubsidy bill, which would have linked subsidies to wage increases and made it necessary for subsidies to achieve their purpose—to hold down the cost of living.

In her first term in Congress Mrs. LUCE introduced two bills related to labor and manpower. They have been falsely described as labor-draft bills, but they did not call for the mass conscription of labor. They were drawn up and introduced primarily to avert such a wholesale draft of labor as was contemplated in the Austin-Wadsworth bill.

The bills introduced by Mrs. LUCE called for utilization in the war effort of men who have not been drafted for military service because of mental or physical disabilities and who continue to work in a nonessential activity.

Men in war-essential activities, which includes the vast majority of union men, would not have been affected in any way by either of these bills.

At the time when it seemed that a draft of labor was inevitable, when even the President called for one, I am sure any labor man, even a Hillman Labor Democrat, would have much preferred either of Mrs. LUCE's measures to the Austin-Wadsworth bill for the indiscriminate conscription of men and women without proper safeguards for unions or individuals.

Yes, as far as labor is concerned, Mrs. LUCE is a thoroughly tested and consistently loyal friend. She is a much better friend than, say, the Democratic candidate for the Vice Presidency who voted for the Smith-Connally bill when it first came up in the Senate. She is a much better friend than Connecticut's New Deal Senator MALONEY who voted for this bill when it was first introduced and then helped to override the President's veto.

Many Republican candidates for Congress have as good a labor record as Mrs. LUCE. Many Democratic candidates have a record of continued sniping at labor. Remember, if the majority party, the party in power, which sponsors and controls most of the legislation to come up in the Seventy-eighth Congress, did not have more than its share of labor haters, so much discriminatory legislation could not possibly have been reported out of committees in either House. And if the administration is returned to power, these same men will still control the Congress as committee chairmen and majority members and we will certainly have more legislation designed to hamstring or crush organized labor.

Now the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is pouring money into congressional districts to defeat Republican candidates.

The C. I. O. Political Action Committee does not care about a candidate's past record in support of or opposition to labor. The C. I. O. Political Action Committee is trying to play politics—power politics—by putting all of labor's eggs in one basket—the very fragile and battered basket of the Roosevelt administration.

Suppose our aging President should be reelected and should die in office? Sidney Hillman and the Political Action Committee would die with him, and then where would labor turn? To Vice President TRUMAN, supporter of the Smith-Connally Anti-Strike bill? To the party which drafted and introduced this and other anti-labor legislation? To the poll-tax boys of the solid South?

I say that the Political Action Committee does not speak for organized labor. I say that it does not speak even for the rank and file of the C. I. O. I say that the workingmen in this country will not consent to being used as poker chips in a political gamble for power.

This committee is trying to give the impression that labor is lost if Roosevelt loses the election. When you look at the voting record of Republican legislators from all parts of the country you know that this is not true.

Labor in this country is wise enough and informed enough not to be stampeded down any one-way street. It fought far too long and far too hard for its gains to risk them all on the election of one candidate or one party. Its future is much too big to be risked and possibly lost with the fortunes of one candidate or to gratify the ambitions of one man. It has far too much at stake in the free American form of government to permit itself to be used as a catspaw by Communists or pinks or others who would like to make some drastic changes in that form of government.

Honest and sincere labor men and labor leaders don't have to be told how to vote this year. They know who their friends are and they know how to distinguish between friend and foe without getting a password from any committee. A true friend of labor, a candidate labor should and must support, is the legislator or official who stuck by us when the going was toughest, when the pressure was heaviest, when all the pull was coming from the other direction, and when the false friends were deserting to the other side.

That is why I, as a labor man and a member of the C. I. O., am glad and proud to second the nomination of labor's proven friend, CLARE BOOTHE LUCE, to represent us again in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

Resignation of Hon. James A. Farley as Chairman of the New York State Democratic Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. BARRY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials:

[From the Syracuse (N. Y.) Herald-Journal of June 10, 1944]

WHY MR. FARLEY RESIGNED

Although he personally offers no explanation save pressure of other business, the reasons for former Postmaster General James A. Farley's resignation as chairman of the Democratic State committee do not seem very obscure.

Mr. Farley has always stood flatly for recognition of the two-term precedent for presidents. He has never believed that President Roosevelt or any other single individual was indispensable. He has felt, and evidently feels today, that more harm might come to the country as a result of the establishment of a precedent that Presidents might serve indefinitely, than from the loss of the services of any particular individual of either party.

Four years ago, when he was sure that President Roosevelt intended to run for a third term, he resigned as Postmaster General and left Washington.

This year, when he was sure that the President was going to run for a fourth term, he resigned as State chairman, evidently burning all of his bridges.

Whether Mr. Farley's move was wise from a straight political standpoint is not clear at this moment. But feeling as he does, it was the morally honest thing to do, anyway. You have to give him credit for having the courage of his convictions.

[From the Greenville (S. C.) News of June 10, 1944]

FARLEY'S RESIGNATION

The resignation of Jim Farley as chairman of the New York Democratic State committee may signify that he is "resigned" to the prospect of a fourth-term nomination and does not wish to serve in a key position in the Democratic campaign to carry New York State.

The most obvious inference from all this is that Mr. Farley, who strongly opposed a third term and apparently is even less enthusiastic about a fourth term does not care to engage in the leadership of the campaign for Roosevelt in New York as would be the logical obligation of the State chairman.

New York is going to be one of the most important battlegrounds in this campaign and it goes without saying that the Democrats will miss the skilled and capable hand of Jim Farley. Presumably he will retire to the side lines for this campaign.

[From the Muncie (Ind.) Star of June 14, 1944]

JIM FARLEY STEPS FROM POLITICS

Big, kindly, canny James A. Farley, of New York, the man who won the 1932 Democratic Presidential nomination for Franklin Roosevelt by his practical and astute spadework with party leaders from precinct committeemen to State chairmen throughout the land, has bowed out of the political scene. He has resigned as New York State Democratic chairman, the last of his prominent party affiliations.

Now chairman of the board of the Coca-Cola Export Sales Co., seeing to it that "cokes" get to our fighting men in all theaters of operations, he said business took all his time and, therefore, he was retiring from the political post. But the observers declared there was more to it than that and "Big Jim" was getting out because he foresaw a fourth-term bid by the man he, more than any other person, placed in the White House. His views are well established.

"Big Jim" Farley, with the welfare of the country always first in his thoughts, was opposed emphatically to a third term and he is even more emphatically opposed to a fourth. He just doesn't think that's the best expression of American self-government and he doesn't want to be connected with an effort to keep one man at the helm in Washington such a long time, so the commentators say.

Whatever the basic reasoning in his resignation, the country lost one of its most loved, one of its fairest and one of its most able politicians—not only of this period, but of all its history—when Jim Farley gave up the New York State chairmanship. And that's using the word "politician" in its very best sense—a real servant to the cause of honorable self-government by a vast people. As national party chairman and as Postmaster

General, Mr. Farley had the highest esteem from the Nation. His has been a true personal contribution to the American scene—an example of what a politician should be. All Indiana offers him a handshake of good will for the future.

Ballot Is Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

BALLOT IS POWER

Some thinkers have said that Americans are yet only half prepared to be responsible voters. In other words, on the average, we do not yet realize the full meaning of our duty as a citizen of a democracy. Too many of us think of our vote as a whip. We surmise that should an officeholder not conform to our wishes, the vote will be used as a whiplash. The vote is that powerful, but with all power goes responsibility. When a man has power, if he uses it for the advantage of his fellow man, he does not regard it as a whip but as a means for improvement and help for all men at one time. Too many regard power as a means only to exert for personal and selected group pressure and let the rest of the Nation take care of itself.

Freedom of the press does not give the right to a man to be a continual disturbing element. In fact, our Constitution made a restriction with extension of freedom of speech and the press. Those who have its power cannot slander nor lie nor use malicious intent. Freedom of speech and press must have responsibility or even that may be vicious and degrading.

So it goes with the power to vote. A person should in all fairness to himself, his community, and Nation, vote for the good of all the people and not for personal prejudice or promotion. He should vote honestly as he sees the issues at hand and the personalities that are in line to handle them.

The ballot is a club that should be handled with great sportsmanship and regard. Some persons may easily become chronic "agginers" so deeply obsessed with prejudice they are removed from straight thinking. It is therefore proper that all of us check and double-check ourselves before we use this power delegated to each American citizen.

The privilege to vote is indeed a power issued to the individual. Privilege carries responsibility. We must get out of our minds the idea to vote for punishment, instead we must seek to vote helpfulness and justice for all.—Anadarko Daily News.

The Proof of the Pudding

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include an editorial from the Daily Times of Mamaroneck, N. Y., published in the issue of Monday, August 28, 1944, titled "The Proof of the Pudding":

PROOF OF THE PUDDING

New dealers, frustrated in their attempt to foist upon the States a "soldier ballot" carrying only Federal candidates, and endeavoring frenziedly to make it appear that the Republican candidates seek to disfranchise those in uniform, have sought to leave the impression that it is extremely difficult for a citizen-soldier to get a 1944 ballot. Particularly, they stress, will it be practically impossible for a soldier serving abroad to get his ballot for this year's election.

To bring those vague, nonsensical partisan allegations up against the cold, realistic background of actual fact, we are quoting herewith from a letter written on August 3 of this year by a White Plains soldier "somewhere in Italy" to his father:

"The clippings are interesting, and informative of the political thought back in the States. The Army is making every effort to get the boys registered, through the war ballot officer in each squadron or company. We had to sign a form stating that we received the registration blank; whether we want to use it or not is up to us. No party will be able to say the Army bungled the vote. * * *

"I just received acknowledgment from the Board of Elections, White Plains, that they had received my application. It will be mailed 'on or about September 7.' So, all is ready."

There is not a soldier eligible to vote in New York State, we are convinced, who cannot receive a ballot in plenty of time for voting and returning, provided he wants to vote. The attempt to create a contrary impression is a plain effort to confuse and to antagonize by the C. I. O. branch of the New Deal.

Training of Disabled War Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I have been deeply impressed by the following official circular sent out by the International Association of Machinists of the American Federation of Labor on the matter of the training of disabled war veterans. Particularly do I want to draw attention to the resolution passed by this union stating that no veteran of this war will be asked to pay any initiation fee or admission fee if he applies for membership in this union.

The official circular of the International Association of Machinists follows:

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS,
Washington, D. C., August 11, 1944.
Official Circular No. 417.
Subject: Training Disabled War Veterans.

To the Order Everywhere, Greetings:

Each week finds an increasing number of disabled war veterans returning from the battle front who are desirous of resuming employment in industry. These disabled veterans who witnessed some of their buddies blown to bits by shell shot and themselves under fire suffered injury must be afforded every opportunity to get the finest type of training to make an adequate living for themselves and families. To take any other position would be unsportsmanlike and un-American. Relegating disabled veterans to unimportant, poor-paying jobs will break their spirit. A man with a broken spirit is the most unfortunate being on earth.

Since most industrial insurance rates increase in proportion to the number of disabled persons employed by a given concern we must insist that industrial insurance laws be drastically overhauled so that the employer engaging these disabled veterans will not be penalized because of employing their share of disabled war veterans for training.

This war has shown that industry can use handicapped workers. Disabled veterans must not be relegated to the scrap heap. As an evidence of our deep concern for these disabled veterans the executive council of the International Association of Machinists is directing all subordinate local and district lodges and the membership everywhere to cooperate in every manner possible with Federal, State, Dominion, provincial, and municipal agencies to train disabled war veterans so these men, to whom we civilians owe so much, are fitted to again take a deserving place in American industries and be self-supporting.

Each local and district lodge is requested to create a veterans' rehabilitation committee, such committee to be required to familiarize itself with the provisions of all laws and resolutions relating to disabled veterans, that have been adopted by the Federal, State, Dominion, provincial, or municipal governments. Each local or district lodge is requested to acquaint local draft boards and bona fide veterans' organizations of the policy of the International Association of Machinists and our desire to assist in the work for rehabilitating disabled veterans. By thus extending our cooperation we demonstrate our consciousness of civilian responsibility and in a small way pay our indebtedness to the returning disabled veterans.

Before closing we believe it timely and opportune to embody a resolution adopted by the executive council of the International Association of Machinists during December of 1943 and submitted to the general membership on January 17, 1944, same reading as follows:

"Resolved, Veterans of the present war, not members of the International Association of Machinists, on reentering industry, to perform work coming under the jurisdiction of the International Association of Machinists, when applying for membership in our association, will be exempt from paying an admission fee, providing they can show evidence of honorable discharge from any military branch of the United States, Dominion of Canada, or Newfoundland."

Your cooperation will be appreciated.

With best wishes, we remain,

Fraternally yours,

H. W. BROWN,
International President.
E. C. DAVISON,
General Secretary-Treasurer.

Veterans' Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include herewith a revised and up-to-date analysis of Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress. It is based on a radio talk made by me over Station WHP, Harrisburg, Pa., on June 18. It describes the important basic legislation passed by the Congress and known as the G. I. bill of rights. I feel confident that it will be most valuable to keep for reference. The bill had my strong support at all times and my vote upon final passage. I am going to give you a short summary of just what the bill does. Obviously, time does not permit me to go into too great detail; also, rules and regulations to be set forth in the future by the Veterans' Administration as authorized by the act will develop more accurately and more specifically these rights and also the procedure which the veteran must follow. However, I do believe that anyone who reads this closely will know, in general, what benefits accrue to him or her under this bill. The summary follows:

ELIGIBILITY

In order to be eligible the general rule is that a man or woman must have served in the active forces of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, or any of their component parts, during the period beginning September 16, 1940, and lasting up to the end of the present war. Such person must have served for a period of at least 90 days, or have been sooner discharged for disability incurred in line of duty. In addition, he or she must have been released from active service under conditions other than dishonorable. No distinction is made between enlistment and induction.

HOSPITALIZATION AND CLAIMS

First. The Veterans' Administration is declared an essential war agency, and entitled, second only to the War and Navy Departments, to priorities on personnel, equipment, supplies, and materials. Priorities for materials are also given to any State institution built or to be built for the care or hospitalization of veterans. These provisions are extremely important. In practical effect they mean that the minute the war ends, at which time the Army and Navy will have no further pressing need for supplies, then the veterans' hospitals will have first call on the goods on hand. Until that time they will have second call.

Second. The bill orders the Veterans' Administration and the Federal Board of Hospitalization to provide additional necessary hospital facilities and authorizes arrangements for the mutual use of hospitals, and so forth, with the Army and the Navy. For this purpose it authorizes the appropriation of $500,000,000. These hospitals will care for diseases and disabilities nonservice connected as well as those incurred in service.

Third. Personnel of the Veterans' Administration may be placed in Army and Navy discharge centers, and so forth, to adjudicate disability claims and to give advice as to their rights and benefits to all servicemen about to be discharged. It forbids the discharge of servicemen and servicewomen until a substantial part of their pay is ready or, if disabled, until adequate arrangements have been made for filing claims for benefits provided.

These two requirements are extremely helpful. At one time a great deal of needless trouble and grief was caused by hasty releases, leaving the veteran more or less stranded. To some degree this has all been remedied by the cumulative efforts of individual Congressmen, including myself, through the exertion of pressure on the War and Navy Departments, thereby securing this action from those departments of their own accord.

Fourth. A further clause states that recognized veterans' associations shall place representatives at the various discharge centers to aid servicemen about to be released. The American Legion, the V. F. W., the D. A. V., and other similar patriotic organizations are admirably equipped to do this. They are eager and anxious so to do. They have been doing this job. They can now be of even greater help in the future than in the past to the veterans about to leave the service and reenter civilian life.

Fifth. It gives the veteran safeguards in respect to various statements against his own interest, and with respect to review of irregular discharges.

EDUCATION

First. It extends the right of vocational education for service-incurred disabilities to those who served during the period of September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

Second. All veterans whose education was interrupted or interfered with by reason of their entrance into the service will be eligible for 1 year's education at any school or institution of his own choice and in any subject or subjects desired for which he or she is fitted. He must start the course not later than 2 years after either the date of his discharge or the termination of the war, whichever is later.

In order to make these opportunities widely available, it is stipulated that anyone who is under 25 years of age at the time he or she entered the service "shall be deemed to have had his education or training impeded or delayed." This means that if the veteran was under 25 when inducted, then the solid presumption will be that this did cut into his education, whether or not he was in fact going to school or to college at the time. If he is over 25, then he or she must show that his education actually was interrupted.

Third. Every veteran can have a year refresher course. Every person who has served 90 days is entitled to a refresher or retraining course not in excess of 1 year. This is entirely irrespective of age and all veterans have to do is to prove that they had been in the armed services for the required time.

Fourth. The veteran may select any approved educational institution in any State in the Union whether he resides there or not. An educational or training institution is defined to include all public or private, elementary or secondary schools, business schools and colleges, scientific and technical institutions, vocational schools, junior colleges, teachers' colleges, and so forth, and also technical training-on-the-job schools. It amounts to complete freedom of choice.

Also, an employed veteran may take part-time study under certain rules.

Fifth. The training shall be for a period of not to exceed 1 year, but it may be extended for another 3 years, except in respect to refresher or retraining courses. In brief, the requirement for getting the additional years is that the student fulfill satisfactorily the educational standards of the college or school at which he is studying. However, the greatest length of time which anyone can spend in college will be the length of his or her service after September 16, 1940, and before the termination of the war, excluding the time spent in completed courses in the Army and Navy college and school training programs, as modified by the following paragraph:

Anyone who has spent 90 days in the armed services (excluding time spent in completed Army and Navy college-training programs) is entitled to 1 year's education. If the veteran has been in the services for 90 days or more, then he is also entitled to Government-provided education equivalent to the full amount of time he has spent in the Army. This is in addition to the 1 year. For example, Private John Doe has spent 1 year in the Army. He is entitled to 1 year's education in return for his first 3 months' service. Assuming he has satisfactorily passed his course, then he is entitled to 12 months additional over and above the year awarded to him by virtue of the first 90 days' service. This 12 months is to compensate him for his entire period of service and the first 3 months counts as part of this time of service. Note that the original 3 months counts as part of this time of service. Note that the original 3 months' period counts double:

(a) It entitles him to 1 year's education.

(b) It counts as part of his full time spent in the service in computing the amount of Government education which will be given to him.

Thus Private John Doe may receive 2 full years' education in return for 1 year's service. If John Doe has spent 3 years in the service, then he can get the maximum amount, i. e., 4 years' education. If he has spent 6 years in the service, he still can only secure 4 years' education because that is the top limit.

Sixth. The Administrator pays the institution the tuition and also the laboratory, library, health, infirmary, and similar fees. The Administrator may pay for books, supplies, and equipment. However the total of such payments shall not exceed $500 for an ordinary school year.

While pursuing a course of education or training the veteran will also be paid a subsistence allowance of $50 per month if without a dependent, or $75 per month if he has a dependent. Any sums paid to the veteran in apprentice schools, and so forth, for work done will be proportionately deducted.

Seventh. It takes time to get this program into full operation. However, to enable the educational features to get under way at once as much as possible, the Veterans' Administration has prepared a form called Veterans' Administration Rehabilitation Form 1950. This can be obtained from the Veterans' Administration in Washington, or any of its regional offices, from veterans' organizations, or you can get one through my office. When filled out this form may be filed with the Veterans' Administration or with the school or college which the veteran wishes to attend.

Many boys and girls already discharged want to enter school this fall. They can do so if they fill out and file Form 1950 now. The Veterans' Administration will later notify you when it approves your application. You can matriculate without awaiting this notification, but the Government will not pay your expenses or allowance until it has passed on your eligibility. But if you and the school or college are satisfied that you are eligible, you can go ahead now and be reasonably certain that your application will be approved in due course.

LOANS

Any eligible veteran within 2 years after separation from the service or 2 years after termination of the war, whichever is later, may apply for a guarantee by the Administrator of not to exceed 50 percent of the loan or loans for specified purposes, provided that the aggregate amount guaranteed shall not exceed $2,000. For example, if the veteran borrows $5,000 or $10,000 he will get only $2,000 guaranteed. If he borrows $3,000, then he will have only $1,500 guaranteed—50 percent of $3,000.

Interest on the guaranteed part of the loan for the first year shall be paid by the Veterans' Administration. This gives the veteran more chance to get started. The loans shall run for not more than 20 years at not to exceed 4-percent interest. The loans to be guaranteed may be made by private persons, firms, or corporations, or by governmental agencies and governmental corporations. In connection with governmental loans, there are certain other liberalizing features.

Second. The specified purposes for which loans can be made are: (a) The purchase or construction of homes, or repairs to them or to pay delinquent taxes on a home; (b) The purchase of a farm, farm equipment, livestock, and for repairs on farms; (c) the purchase of a business, business property, business equipment, to be used in a gainful occupation. I hope that this will start many veterans on the road to becoming successful small-business men and to a revival of small business in this country.

The loans must be approved and the act sets out the broad standards to govern the Veterans' Administrator in his decisions as to whether or not to approve. In general, they are the same that any lending institution would apply: (a) That the proceeds be used for the purpose requested; (b) that the property will be useful and necessary; (c) that the ability and experience of the veteran and the conditions under which he proposes to pursue such occupation are such that there is a reasonable likelihood that he will succeed; and (d) that the price paid does not exceed a reasonable normal value as determined by proper appraisal.

In the case of homes, the amount and terms of the payments must bear a proper relation to the veteran's present and anticipated income and expenses.

EMPLOYMENT

The reemployment provisions are substantially the same as those now in effect. A veterans' employment representative, who shall be a veteran, is attached to the United States Employment Service in each State. He will help to get jobs, give information, and so forth. This is substantially what Bill Ilgenfritz is now doing so well in Pennsylvania at present. It should be noted that the veteran has other employment rights under the Selective Service Act and other laws passed by the Congress.

READJUSTMENT ALLOWANCES

First. Eligible veterans who are unemployed are entitled to receive under certain conditions unemployment compensation at the rate of $20 per week for a maximum of 52 weeks within a 5-year period immediately following the termination of hostilities. The unemployment must begin within 2 years after discharge or the end of the war, whichever is later. A proportionate amount may be paid to the partially employed who receive less than the $20 allowance per week given by the act plus $3, that is, $23.

The allowance for a week will be $20 less that part of the wages payable to the partially unemployed for such week which is in excess of $3—figured to the nearest highest multiple of $1 where it does not come out even. Thus, if the veteran is earning $10, you subtract $3 from the $10, leaving $7. You then subtract the $7 from the $20, and his weekly payment for readjustment would be $13. Stated conversely, it is $23 per week less the amount earned in partial employment during the week.

Second. A claimant will be disqualified if he or she leaves suitable work voluntarily or is discharged for misconduct; if he or she fails to accept suitable work when offered to him or her or refuses to attend an available free training course; and also in certain cases where work stoppages are caused by labor disputes, but only if he or she is participating therein.

Third. Provision is made for self-employed veterans engaged in a trade, business, profession, and so forth. If his net earnings have been less than $100 in the previous calendar month, he can receive the difference between $100 and his net earnings for such month. This provision is not in our social security law and, so far as I know, is an innovation in our law. It should enable enterprising veterans to become self-employed.

Fourth. Those unemployed prior to September 4, 1944, are not eligible for any payments. On and after September 4 those who are either unemployed or partially unemployed can make application and their payments should start shortly. Any unemployed or partially unemployed veteran can file at the State Employment Office, or, if he is a railroad man, at the Railroad Employment Office.

Fifth. Where a claimant receives other Federal or State benefit, a proportionate adjustment is made in his allowance. Also, veterans who have rights under two or more different sections of this act can only receive the fair and proportionate amount.

PENALTIES

Anyone receiving any money under this title with intent to defraud shall be punished by a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than 1 year or both. The same penalty applies to anyone making a false statement or misrepresentation. Anyone knowingly accepting an allowance to which he is not entitled shall be ineligible to receive any further allowance of any kind under this title. As to other fraudulent claims under this act the general penal statutes will be applicable.

MISCELLANEOUS

This summary includes only the G. I. bill of rights. The Congress has passed other laws of benefit to veterans. These include muster-out payments, national life insurance, dependency benefits, maternity care, death gratuity, and others. Anyone in Cumberland, Dauphin, and Lebanon Counties can get information on where and how to apply for these benefits by getting in touch with my office.

Important: The Selective Service Act gives the veteran certain rights to his old job under certain rules and regulations. In this connection be sure to remember that the act requires the veteran to make application for reemployment within 40 days after he is relieved from training and service. Complying with this is essential if the veteran is to retain his reemployment rights with his employer. Keep this in mind and do not permit this valuable right to lapse.

Many veterans, or their families, will want additional information on various parts of this program. The Veterans' Administration is the source of all authoritative rulings on this and similar veterans' laws. If anyone feels that it would be helpful to have me get in touch with the Veterans' Administration in behalf of himself or others, just write your Congressman, JOHN C. KUNKEL, at either 459 Old House Office Building, Washington 25, D. C., or to 20 South River Street, Harrisburg, Pa. If you prefer, telephone me at 4–3356 on the Harrisburg exchange. If I am not there, my secretary, Mrs. Richings, will take your message and forward it on to me or arrange an appointment. She may very probably be able to help you, herself. Both Mrs. Richings in Harrisburg and Miss Garney in Washington have had much experience in this work. All three of us find it a real and great pleasure to do anything possible for the boys and girls in the services and for their loved ones back home.

Farley Steps Down

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW J. MERRITT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Auburn (N. Y.) Citizens-Advertiser of June 10, 1944, titled "Farley Steps Down."

FARLEY STEPS DOWN

The resignation of James A. Farley as chairman of the Democratic State Committee brings to a close a 14-year term which included conspicuous political success for the Democrats not only in the State but also in the Nation.

As campaign manager for Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932 and 1936, Mr. Farley saw his candidate elected by huge electoral majorities, the adverse vote in 1936 being confined, as he predicted, to only two States, Maine and Vermont. Opposed to a third term, and, for the same reasons, to a fourth, Mr. Farley in 1940 handed over the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee to Edward J. Flynn, confining himself to State activities.

Until Thomas E. Dewey upset the applecart in 1942, the Democrats had been consistently victorious in New York State since the mid-twenties. For nearly two decades Al Smith, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and Herbert Lehman monopolized the governorship; but when Mr. Farley chose to back John J. Bennett, a candidate unacceptable to the American Labor Party, the solid front was cracked.

Press and radio commentators are trying to read motives into Mr. Farley's resignation. They are not satisfied with the statement that he can no longer devote the time required for proper conduct of the State office during an important Presidential year. Knowing that Mr. Farley did not favor breaking the two-term tradition, they jump to the conclusion that he will oppose President Roosevelt's renomination in the convention. That is a risky guess.

Mr. Farley is fundamentally a party man. He is also a realist. In 1940, after registering objections to a third term, he turned to support Roosevelt following the nomination. This year it is practically a certainty that Roosevelt will be nominated on the first ballot. If Farley decides to make a futile gesture and enter into an open fight against President Roosevelt's renomination for a fourth term, it will be a departure from his usual procedure. He is not in the habit of disturbing party unity when nothing is to be gained from it.

Both friends and adversaries will grant that James A. Farley has been the ablest strategist which either party has produced in the last quarter of a century. But there was more in his success than strategy. There was affability amounting to genius. He made every new acquaintance feel that he was an intimate friend. He signed more personal letters and autographed more pictures than a dozen men in his position usually do. And it wasn't just the big shots on whom his genial smile was turned. The humblest party worker basked in the rays of his warm personality; and when Farley started in calling each by his first name, it was only natural to answer with "Jim."

The secret of Farley's success was this combination of the old-time politician who knew everybody with the technique of modern organizational methods. Jim was about the best fence-builder any party ever had. The trouble with Farley is that in the Democratic Party today fences are superfluous.

Let Us Develop Our Inland Waterways

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an address delivered by me before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress at New Orleans, La., on July 27, 1944.

It reads as follows:

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, members of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, I believe it was Confucius, the great Chinese philosopher, who once said to make your speeches short if you want them to be long remembered. I shall try to follow that sage advice today.

You may be, by my remarks, like the fellow was by a proposed bill to tax bachelors. Some fellow said that if they put a heavy tax on bachelors that would make them marry, and then he said they would live longer. Up piped an old bachelor from the Middle West and said, "Well, they wouldn't live any longer; it would just seem longer." [Laughter.]

I hope my remarks today won't seem any longer than they really are.

I have no speech cut and dried for this occasion. However, I am satisfied that by the time I am through you will all say that it was dry enough.

I am for the development of our inland waterways—our entire waterway systems, from the source down—as well as the harbors into which they flow. The greatest natural wealth in America, outside of the soil from which we live, are these golden streams that drain our soil, provide hydroelectric power, and furnish us highways of navigation. I believe in using the water to water the people first, the stock second, and the land next, to generate hydroelectric power next, and then for navigation purposes.

I have consistently advocated that policy ever since I have been in Congress.

As co-author of the bill creating the Tennessee Valley Authority, I held out for that policy more than 10 years ago, just as I have on the Columbia River, and every other stream. The results have more than justified my contentions.

The T. V. A. has wrought the greatest development of ancient or modern times. I repeat that. The T. V. A. has wrought the greatest development of ancient or modern times. We have not only provided a new water transportation highway of more than 650 miles on the Tennessee, and connected it up with the great Mississippi Valley system, but we have controlled the floods on that stream, we have conserved the soil, and are today generating 12,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity a year on the Tennessee and its tributaries.

To let you know what that means, the power generated at Muscle Shoals alone exceeds the combined physical strength of all of the slaves freed by the Civil War; while the 12,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours generated by the T. V. A. every year equals the strength of 40,000,000 men working 8 hours a day 300 days a year. Electricity is the greatest servant mankind has ever known, and the only one the man or woman of ordinary means can afford.

I have been referred to as the father of rural electrification. I do not deny the soft impeachment. I began this struggle for rural electrification more than 10 years ago, and today, as a result of those efforts, joined in by some of my colleagues who are here today and by some who have already passed to the Great Beyond, there are more than 1,000,000 farm homes tonight enjoying the benefits of electricity, taking to them everything we have in the city except the noise and the city taxes. More than a million homes are enjoying those blessings now, and believe me, when this war is over and materials are again made available, we are going to continue the drive until we reach them all.

There is another thing that these streams should be used for, and that is national defense. I have always been disappointed that the Gulf coast was not better defended; for that reason, I am supporting this deep-water route into New Orleans, and also to Gulfport and Mobile and other points along the Gulf coast. I am not willing to depend on the goodwill of foreign politicians for our protection after this war. I am not looking for the millennium. But when the war is over, we want an Air Force and a Navy second to none, to protect our country and to help maintain the peace of the civilized world.

We have one great bottleneck in our inland waterway system that is costing us untold millions, if not billions, of dollars, that I want to talk to you about today, and that is the swift current on the Mississippi River. The other day we were discussing this slack water route up the Tombigbee and into the Tennessee River, when General Robbins, one of the ablest men who has ever been on the Board of Army Engineers, and now Assistant Chief, appeared before the Senate committee.

Now let me give you a brief outline of the situation. From Cairo to New Orleans and across to Mobile, and up the Tombigbee to the Tennessee, thence downstream to Cairo is a distance of 1,768 miles. Of that 1,768 miles, 1,121 miles of it is downstream. Practically two-thirds of the distance is downstream and the rest is in slack water. General Robbins said before the Senate committee:

"If we came up here and submitted a report recommending a project for slack water on the Mississippi between Cairo and New Orleans, by building locks and dams on the Mississippi River itself, at an estimated cost of $66,000,000, I think you would all take off your hats and cheer.

"This alternate route on the Tombigbee we are recommending amounts to the same thing, only the locks and dams are to be built on the Tombigbee instead of the Mississippi. There is no greater tangible saving than that which will accrue from use of the Tennessee-Tombigbee route instead of the Mississippi for the upstream traffic."

This would provide a slack-water route up to the Tennessee and a downstream route from there to Cairo, and at the same time retain the downstream route on the swift Mississippi from Cairo to New Orleans for the downstream traffic. It can be best described as a counterclockwise route using the Mississippi route downstream, then along the Intracoastal Waterway to Mobile, thence by way of the Tombigbee up this slack-water route to the Tennessee River, and thence down the Tennessee and the Ohio to Cairo.

I want everyone here to take note of this, because it involves everybody in what we call the Mississippi Valley area, from Pittsburgh, Pa., to Sioux City, Iowa, from the Alleghenies to the Rockies. When I say that I want you to know that I am not slighting rivers elsewhere, because I have borne the brunt of the battle in the Congress of the United States for the improvement of the Columbia River system, and every other river, when it came to developing hydroelectric power and all of the other facilities those streams afford.

Now, let's see what this means to you. One of the Army engineers prepared these figures for me, and I want you to hear them. An 8-barge load—that is, a tow and 8 barges—with an average of 3,500-ton load, going from New Orleans to Cairo, fighting the swift current on the Mississippi River, would spend for fuel alone $6,273. Going the other way or through the Tombigbee-Tennessee counter-clockwise route, the same tow, with the same load, would spend for fuel and lockage $3,868, or a saving of $2,405. If it were going to Paducah or to any point on the upper Ohio, the saving would be $2,803. Every barge load that comes down has to go back. Such a barge load from Pittsburgh, Pa., or Louisville, Ky., Cincinnati, Ohio, or Wheeling, W. Va., Chicago, St. Louis, or Cairo, St. Paul or Minneapolis, or from Kansas City, Omaha, or Sioux City, bringing us everything from machinery product at Pittsburgh to wheat and corn and beef products from Iowa or Nebraska—every single one of them on the return trip would save an average of $2,500.

That would mean that traffic on the Mississippi would double and treble and quintuple in a few years. It would not take any traffic away from New Orleans, but it would far more than double the traffic on the Mississippi, and at the same time it would save untold millions of dollars to the shippers up and down these streams.

In my opinion, such a project would pay for itself in less than 2 years.

If such a barge load were going up into the Tennessee River, where we have that great wealth of raw materials, and where you are going to get your finished aluminum for probably a century to come, going from New Orleans to any point on the upper Tennessee, it would save $4,507. Going from Mobile to Cairo, the saving would be $3,270 a trip. But if it were going from Mobile into the Tennessee River, it would save $5,392 on every such load. Going from the mouth of the Warrior River—and that includes Birmingham—to Cairo, the saving would be $5,448. If it were going to Paducah—and that means to Pittsburgh, Louisville, Cincinnati, or Wheeling, the saving would be $5,847. But if it were going from Mobile into the Tennessee Valley, that great area now being so rapidly developed and in which we are producing so much of war materials, the saving would amount to $7,551 a trip.

What does that mean? It means it would bring the cost of such transportation down tremendously. It is the greatest project of its kind on earth, and the only one left where you can transfer the traffic from one major watershed to another with so much ease, at so little expense, and with such tremendous savings in transportation cost and distances. The only parallel is the connection between the Don and Volga Rivers, that has saved the Russians in this war.

So far as we are concerned, this is the greatest project of its kind ever proposed.

I know there are some people who will say that the Army engineers investigated this project and turned it down a number of years ago. Of course they did; for until we built the dams on the Tennessee River, there was no outlet. We had no 9-foot channel to the Tennessee River. We would have been going into a dead end. Besides, at that time we would have had to have lifts going up from the Tennessee, as well as up from the Tombigbee, without any water supply at the summit with which to operate the locks.

But when we built the Pickwick Dam on the Tennessee River, just below where this project joins the Tennessee, we raised the water level 55 feet at the mouth of Yellow Creek, and that enabled the Army Engineers to cut through the sand ridge separating the 2 watersheds and placed the summit of the project in the Tennessee River—in Pickwick Lake.

It makes a perfect set-up. Oh, but they went down the Tombigbee and said, "John Rankin is going to flood you to death!" Which, of course, was pure nonsense! The only water turned from the Tennessee will be just enough to run the first lock. Any of you who have been through the Panama Canal will recall that it is 85 feet above sea level. We couldn't operate those locks with sea level water. We had to dam the Chagres River and turn it into Gatun Lake. The only water turned into the canal is just enough to run the locks. That is what we did there, and that is what we propose to do here.

They continue to try to alarm the people of Tennessee by telling them that it would produce a water scarcity on that stream. The truth is that it wouldn't let enough water out of the Tennessee for you to discover it. It probably wouldn't lower the water level on Pickwick Lake one-half of an inch if you ran a barge through there every hour.

We are not building just for today! We are not preparing just for tomorrow! But this is a project that will last for a thousand years. That is what we are building for.

When our boys come home from this war, it will furnish employment for five or six thousand of them for about six or seven years. We want something for these young men to do. They want useful work. They don't want to rake leaves and chase mosquitoes, but they want employment that will help in building up the country, for themselves and their children and their children's children.

Again let me say to you that one of the paramount issues is national defense, and it always will be. Don't forget, as I said, that we are not going to be protected by somebody way off yonder. We are going to have to keep our own powder dry. I said the other day, and I say again, that one of our danger points is New Orleans and the Gulf Coast. Why? Because this Gulf Coast is what might be called the underbelly of the United States. The Gulf of Mexico is our Caribbean. The last time we were invaded, was right here. It is the most vulnerable portion of the United States. It must not be neglected any longer.

When Frank Reid, who sits by me here, was in Congress, he and I were fighting to defend General Billy Mitchell, who was showing us then what an air force could do, and pointing out the way to modern aerial warfare. If they had followed Billy Mitchell's advice, the Pearl Harbor disaster never would have happened. God bless his sacred memory. [Applause.]

I hope to see a monument erected to him as one of the greatest and most far-seeing military men America has ever produced.

In the years to come, we want to cooperate with the civilized nations of the earth, not only to maintain, but to enforce peace. But we want to be very sure that our own country is properly defended; and nothing would contribute more to that end than the development of our inland waterways—including this deep waterway along the Gulf Coast. If then, in the years to come, the Mississippi should be closed, as it once was at Vicksburg, then with this Tennessee-Tombigbee project, which would be protected from attack from the sea, we would still have an outlet.

Let's build America. Let us develop our own natural resources, beginning, as I said, where the water trickles down the hillside, and prevent the pouring of our alluvial soil into the Gulf of Mexico. Let us develop the water power we have today, improve the navigation of every stream, and provide a deep channel for the protection of the Gulf coast.

Last year there was produced and sold 184,000,000,000 kilowatt hours of electricity in the United States. There are 230,000,000,000 kilowatt hours of undeveloped hydroelectric power going to waste in our navigable streams and their tributaries every year—enough to light and heat every home, to pump the water, milk the cows, and freeze the ice—enough to make America the richest and most powerful and most desirable country on the face of the earth.

I am for the development of all of it—but at the same time I want to provide for navigation on these streams so that we can take from the backs of our people the onerous burden of discriminatory freight rates. I say that not only for us here in the South, but for our fellow sufferers from Nebraska, South Dakota, Iowa, and every other section of the country. We want to see that everybody in America receives justice in transportation rates.

These are the things I am driving at. I am not willing to generate this power at public expense and then permit the plundering of the people through exorbitant light and power rates. It must be provided at rates the people can afford to pay, and it must be extended to every farm home in America.

In conclusion, let me give you an idea of what that means to some of the States. In Pennsylvania, for instance, with the proper rates last year, you would have saved $99,000,000 on your light and power bills. In New York you would have saved $195,000,000. The people of Georgia would have saved $18,000,000; Florida, $24,000,000; Ohio, $76,000,000; Texas, $45,000,000; Missouri, $29,000,000; and other States in proportion. This is a great natural resource—the greatest in all the world outside of the soil. Electricity is the lifeblood of our advancing civilization. The cheaper the rates, the more freely it flows; and the more freely it flows, the greater are its benefits to mankind.

It is our duty to see that the waterpower of this Nation is developed and provided to the American people at rates they can afford to pay, beginning with the T. V. A. rates as a yardstick basis, and reducing them as the economic situation justifies.

When our boys come home, let them not only find the American flag flying above American institutions, the same institutions their forefathers established, but let them not find a Fascist, a Communist, or a Socialist state of which they would be ashamed. Let them find the American way of life that you and I have lived. Let them find the real America for which they are now fighting. Let them not find our great resources neglected, but let them find an America where their representatives here and in Congress have taken every precaution to develop those resources and to provide them at the cheapest possible rates to make America for them and their children and their children's children, a richer and better and brighter place in which to live, and one they can always defend, and of which they can always be proud. [Applause.]

Congress Deserves Respect

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED NORMAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. NORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD today a column written by a good newspaperman and a good friend of mine, Mr. Chapin Collins, in his weekly paper, the Montesano (Wash.) Vidette.

Mr. Collins, a veteran of this war, is presently connected with the American Forest Products Industries, Inc., in the association's Washington, D. C., office, and writes a weekly column for the Vidette, which he owns.

One of his recent writings covered the subject of the public and press attitude towards Congress. Mr. Collins very lucidly takes the position that, by and large, Congress is composed of able, hard-working, intelligent men doing a hard and harassing job. He scores those portions of the press and public which habitually sneer at Congress and jibe unmercifully, and often unthinkingly, at the little foibles which any large group of human beings will inevitably display, forgetting for the most part the exceedingly difficult and complex tasks which every one of us accomplish every day for the benefit of our districts, States, and the Nation.

I want by this means to extend to Mr. Collins my personal gratitude for his kind and encouraging remarks about Congressmen. I believe all of you who read his column I here insert will agree that he has assayed our worth in clear, impartial fashion—in short, that Mr. Collins has said a few kind words on a subject that is too often a target only for the clever, barbed, and erroneous writings and words of people who lack Mr. Collins' knowledge of it.

The column includes a tribute to Senator HOMER T. BONE, who is retiring as a representative of my State in the Upper Chamber to become a Federal circuit judge. While Senator BONE and I have differed politically, and belong to different parties, we have been warm personal friends for more than a quarter century, and I am glad that Mr. Collins took the Senator as his example of a good legislator.

The Collins column follows:

CHAPIN'S COLUMN

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Newspapers of Washington are seldom guilty of a phobia that seems to afflict a large segment of the American press, which is a constant badgering and belittling of Congress.

A large part of our free press, which after all is dependent upon continuance of free government, takes advantage of every possible opportunity (and creates others) to convince their readers that Congressmen as a whole are a moronic, greedy, often corrupt, and foolish lot of people who seem bent on misrepresenting their constituents.

You find almost none of this attitude in the newspapers of the Capital which, after all, have the best opportunity of observing foibles of the legislative branch. Certainly, of all newspapers, they have an objective and disinterested point of view, because no resident of the District of Columbia has a voice in electing Congressmen. In fact—which the rest of the country often forgets—residents of the District of Columbia have no vote on anything, not even their own local affairs. A soldier from here, for example, cannot vote.

The newspapers here evaluate Representatives and Senators on their own individual merits. Some they like and some they don't, and they don't hesitate to say so. But the institution of Congress commands their respect as, indeed, it should of the country as a whole.

There is no excuse for this barrage of jibes, and more than that, there is positive danger in it. The fact that we are fighting for democracy doesn't guarantee the democratic form of government, or to be more accurate, the representative republican form of government. If we are cynically agreed that the very men we elect can't be trusted, or are below normal, then the stage is set, indeed, for some form of fascism, without the help of Hitler.

There is no excuse for these jibes because there is no truth in them. Most Congressmen not only serve to the best of their ability, but they have ability, too. They are a hard-working group, probably more hard working than the average of business and professional men from whom they are largely recruited. Congressional casualties have been high, a reflection of the fact that they are hard pressed, harassed, and often confused by the complexities with which they constantly deal.

If you complain that we seem to have fewer statesmen in Congress than we used to, I'll reply that the people themselves are largely to blame. You have no idea of the multiplicity of requests and demands made of congressmen. Some receive hundreds of letters a day, asking for this and that. Each requires some attention. Some require a great deal of attention, calls on various bureaus, digging out facts, attendance at conferences. A Representative usually has a secretary and a stenographer. A Senator may have a larger staff.

It is nothing short of amazing the volume of material through which they plow every day. A large proportion of this work has nothing whatever to do with problems of legislation. A Congressman could keep busy even if he eliminated all legislative considerations.

But, you say, he shouldn't permit himself to be deflected by all these minor matters. Maybe so, but he wouldn't be a Congressman long. A Representative's employers are a hard lot. They threaten to fire him every 2 years. They are more likely to judge him by the way he responds to personal requests than by the way he acts in congressional committees or in the performance of other duties required of him by the Constitution. A new post-office building looms larger than intelligence in dealing with subjects of broad national scope.

Newspapers in Washington have little opportunity to observe how a Congressman jumps about on demand of local chambers of commerce, labor unions, farm organizations, and other groups. They see more of him in his role of legislator. They know little of all the local influences bearing on him and therefore take him pretty much as he is.

I think Senator HOMER T. BONE of our State is a good example of this. In the State of Washington he was for years a leading advocate of public ownership of electric utilities. Those who opposed him on this issue can see little good in him on any issue. They can't divorce him from his history in the homeland.

But Senator BONE has enjoyed in the Capital a higher prestige, I think, than he has enjoyed at home, even though he has been rather uniformly successful at getting elected. He is recognized here as a man of broad intellect, of wide interests, and of a fighting and fearless disposition. He is respected by foe as well as friend. I believe he has tried, during his terms of office, to act the statesman, and, to a very considerable degree, he has succeeded. This is true, whatever you may think of his ideas on public ownership. He has reflected credit on the State of Washington. His retirement to the Federal bench is regarded here as a loss to the Senate.

It is all a matter of balance. A Member of Congress ought not to ignore the needs of the communities he represents. It is incumbent upon him to serve those who elected him. At the same time, he is also a servant of all the Nation. It would help if the people at home would remember this and refrain, as much as possible, from complicating an already complicated situation.

Congress is blamed for abdicating its powers, for giving in to bureaus which also legislate by regulation. The usual attack on this condition—which undeniably exists—is to roar "Bureaucrat" at the top of one's lungs. That, of course, gets nowhere. To ask that Congressmen perform functions expected of the bureaus is to ask the impossible. A Senator or a Representative is still only one man, and there still are only 24 hours in a day.

I think myself that the flooding tendency toward centralization in this country is unfortunate. It entails deterioration of the free and daring American spirit. I believe that local government is the best government. Its hand should be strengthened. But to recognize these things or to hold these beliefs is not a cure. The cure for bureaucracy does not lie in calling someone a bureaucrat. You must go to the causes.

But—to tie this package with the string I started with—you contribute less than nothing to the preservation of our liberties by weakening Congress. If we persist in such a course long enough, Congress will become a vestigial organ, like the electoral college in politics, and like the appendix in physiology.

War Mobilization and Reconversion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following statement in connection with S. 2051, the war mobilization and reconversion bill:

WHAT WILL BE THE REACTION OF VOTERS TO LAVISHLY GIVING BILLIONS FOR FREEDOM FROM WANT ALL OVER THE WORLD BUT REFUSING TO KEEP HUNGER FROM POSSIBLY MILLIONS OF CHILDREN OF UNEMPLOYED AMERICANS?

Statement of John H. Pierson, Chief of the Post-War Division of the Bureau of Labor Economics, United States Department of Labor, in article in the American Federationist, official organ of the American Federation of Labor:

"Whether or not the return of peace is going to usher in a period of discrimination and bitter group feelings and antagonisms and contentions that draw the lines between men and women, Negroes and whites, ex-servicemen and civilians, native-born and foreign-born, old and young, depends almost entirely on whether or not we allow the unemployment situation to get out of hand."

Pertinent excerpts from address of Chairman ROBERT R. REYNOLDS of the Senate Military Affairs Committee in support of the Kilgore-Murray-Truman bill:

"There are two main objectives that we should keep in mind: First, to establish an indiscriminatory scale of unemployment compensation as between classes and groups, and as between workers in and from different States; and, second, to minimize unemployment itself by maintaining a fair purchasing power amongst the unemployed amounting to a bare subsistence level.

"I submit that it is essential that we use great foresight in considering the problems before us, for our action will affect millions of our people, and will have far-reaching influence upon the future welfare and tranquillity of our Nation.

"Ultimately it will be far less costly to be generous in providing for our unemployed and their families, than to pursue a short-sighted and niggardly course which may engender the very bitter group feelings and antagonisms about which Mr. Pierson so wisely has warned us.

"The civilian unemployed are the fathers, brothers, sisters, wives, and other relatives of those in our armed forces.

"It is well and good, Mr. President, to give medals and erect monuments to our war heroes, but it has well been said that veterans cannot eat medals. Neither can their little children. Erecting stone or bronze monuments is not going to put more food into the mouths of the children of our veterans or more clothing on their little bodies, to protect them from the blasts of winter.

"Who can claim that, with three or four children to support, an unemployed veteran or civilian can keep his children from suffering the pangs of hunger when the family income is only $12 or $18 a week? If we could see hungry children of the unemployed on our doorsteps we would really do something to make proper provision for them.

"We do not seem to bat an eye when it comes to appropriating billions upon billions for the relief of people in all parts of the world, but when we consider the basic needs of possibly millions of children of the unemployed here in America, there appears to be a tendency to adopt a niggardly policy.

"We have been and are planning on being quite generous toward property in reconversion. Should we not be as generous and considerate of humanity as we are of property?

"After all, the whole problem boils down to the humanitarian issue of whether we are or are not going to provide adequately for the children of future unemployed Americans.

"Let us not be in the position of keeping bread from the mouths of hungry little children in this land which has sacrificed its all to aid in bringing freedom from want to the rest of the world."

Demand for Rubber

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Evening Star of August 21, 1944:

RUBBER DEMAND SEEN EXCEEDING SUPPLY FOR 2 YEARS AFTER WAR

NEW YORK, August 21.—The world will need both synthetic rubber and the natural product for at least 2 years after the war, preliminary estimates for prospective supply and demand show.

That forecast is based on a belief among rubbermen that it will take at least 2 years to restore the war-ravaged Far Eastern rubber plantations to full-scale production.

It indicated this country can postpone for some time any decision as to disposal or retention of this Nation's $750,000,000-plus synthetic rubber facilities.

An official United States-British-Dutch study of post-war rubber supply and demand, aimed apparently toward an agreement similar to that recently reached on petroleum, has been started.

POINT TO CONCLUSIONS

Industry estimates point to the conclusions the international group may reach, John Collyer, president of the B. F. Goodrich Co., believes world demand will probably run around 1,600,000 tons a year, compared with the pre-war record of 1,300,000 tons used in 1941. He figures this country's annual requirements will average 850,000 tons a year.

A major oil company foresees an American demand for possibly 1,070,000 tons annually for the first 5 years after the war, to which would be added needs of other nations.

Neither synthetic plants nor plantations could meet either of those totals.

Government-owned synthetic plants, rated at around 820,000 tons a year, may develop a potential of 1,000,000 with privately owned facilities good for another 200,000 tons, Mr. Collyer figures.

MAKESHIFTS MAY AID

Plantations and such wartime makeshifts as guayule, a desert shrub, cryptostegia, a wild vine, and the high-cost South American wild-rubber areas might eventually boost natural rubber output to 1,600,000 tons a year if pushed, Collyer adds.

While the maximum potential thus points to an eventual oversupply, Mr. Collyer believes it will take at least 2 years to get plantations back into operation.

The actual condition of the plantations is unknown. Mr. Collyer assumes the Japanese have not ruined the trees.

Automobile industry men talk of 6,000,000 cars a year, that's 30,000,000 tires. Replacements for automobiles still operating might run that total above 150,000,000. On top of that, hundreds of trucks and busses have been forced off the roads for lack of tires.

Incidental uses include vast quantities for industry, and such smaller needs as 2,100 tons a year for rubber bands, 1,200 tons for garden hose, and even 675 tons for baby pants.

What a Sailor Has To Say

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES V. HEIDINGER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. HEIDINGER. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago there appeared in the March of Progress, a weekly newspaper printed and published at McLeansboro, Hamilton County, Ill., a letter from Carl H. Jordan, a resident of my district, who is now serving in the United States Navy. His home is at McLeansboro, Ill. Under leave to extend my remarks, I ask that this letter be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAMP BRADFORD,
Norfolk, Va., June 18, 1944.

DEAR WARNER: I am in old Virginia, the stamping grounds of the Father of my Country, George Washington.

It was here that the great men of our Nation became inspired with the zeal of justice. It was here that great men showed their love for freedom. It was here that the great Civil War ended. It is consecrated ground for the living and the dead.

Today men are congregated here in arms, training to maintain the principles of Washington and of our great Emancipator, our fellow Illinoisian, Abraham Lincoln.

Men of all nationality and color march arm in arm here to win a just peace. We hope of security, honest political freedom.

The southern boy and the northern boys are in one accord.

They love their families, they want to rear a family in their own way, they love freedom more than they love any material thing or any promises of any group.

There is very little politics spoken here. I know for sure what the Navy men want more than anything. They want any man of any party who will prosecute this war to the fullest extent, with the most effective method. They want justice to be supreme. They want to go home to local government that is clean from corruption and graft. They want clean, honest, American jobs where they can earn an honest living, without strings attached.

Otherwise they want peace on the home front where they can enjoy life as was prepared and prescribed by the Constitution and Bill of Rights. They want the American way of life where competition is progress and where men may enjoy progress and where men may enjoy the fruits of their labor and enjoy the solace of quiet meditation in their beliefs. We Americans of all parties must and will cleanse it from the decay that has set in the two different major parties.

It is up to you and all other Americans to help prepare a cleaner and a better America for the men and women of the armed forces when they come marching back to a peaceful world after victory has come.

The aftermath of this war is what the people must prepare to meet, the farmer, the laborer, the manufacturer and business, clerks, etc. They will swim together or sink together. We will all go down in the valley of death together, roughly speaking, in my way, if we don't get together and express a little more charity and understanding than we have in the past.

One group must not take advantage of another group, but should work in good will and understand in the object of our Nation, in the hope it will strengthen all classes and groups.

All of the wealth of America will not create prosperity after this war. It is how industry and labor function. It means they must work in one accord, to promote the general welfare of our Nation through honest and justifiable reasoning with problems that confront them. Business must have profits that are feasible.

The consuming power should be great among the people.

Farmers must have an honest chance to use their talent for the benefit of the farming communities. They must use their own judgment in building their blueprint for their crops. All Americans must work in one accord to prepare it for the aftermath that will come.

Warner, I can't write you and explain all these things on paper. It would take a hundred sheets to do so. The peace to come must and should be drawn up not by politicians but by men who can use good judgment in working out a peace that will stand for years to come. We must not and will not give up any sovereignty to any country. Our strength is our honor, our family is its strength, our resources, our wealth, our Constitution is our guide, Christ is our master, our hope and guide for all justice through Christ, and Christianity is the only hope of the world. We men of the world are only the captains of our own souls.

Your friend,

CARL H. JORDAN,
Seaman Second Class,
Training Program, ATB.

Death Benefits Available for Widows, Orphans, and Dependents of Deceased Servicemen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1944

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, besides the men who are returned to civil life with broken bodies and shattered nerves, those who find the results of war with them long after the peace are the widows, orphans, and dependents whose loved ones have made the supreme sacrifice.

In recognition of its obligation to those dependents, a just and sympathetic Government has made provision to contribute by way of pension to help them carry on. These benefits are the same for the widows, orphans, and dependents of this war as they are for the dependents surviving our veterans of World War No. 1, so the information given here will apply to both groups.

Pensions or death benefits for widows, orphans, and dependents are paid according to two schedules:

First. Where the death of the veteran has occurred in service, or has resulted from a service-connected disease or injury, the following monthly rates are payable:

(a) For a widow but no child	$50
(b) For a widow and one child (with $13 additional for each additional child—total not to exceed $100)	65
(c) For no widow but one child	25
(d) For no widow but two children (with $10 additional for each additional child—total not to exceed $100)	88
(e) For dependent father and mother:
Both parents, for each	25
One parent only	45

(NOTE.—Pension benefits are allowable to dependent parents only in those cases where the veteran's death is due to service in the armed forces.)

Second. Where the veteran's death was not the result of a service-connected disease or injury, but provided he had at the time of his death a disability incurred in or aggravated in his war service, these monthly rates are payable, subject to income restrictions:

(a) For a widow but no child	$35
(b) For a widow and one child (with $5 additional for each additional child)	45
(c) No widow but one child	18
(d) No widow but two children (equally divided)	27
(e) No widow but three children (equally divided) (With $4 additional for each additional child, the total amount to be equally divided.)	36

(NOTE.—Payments are limited to an aggregate of $64 in any one case.)

NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

All persons in the active service of our armed forces may carry Government National Service Life Insurance in any sum, in multiples of $500, up to $10,000, and may designate as beneficiary anyone in the following permitted classes: Wife, (husband); child (including an adopted child, stepchild, or illegitimate child); parent (including person in loco parentis—foster parent); brother or sister (including those of the half blood) of the insured.

If deductions from service pay to meet premiums have been authorized, this insurance cannot lapse during active service, including the time carried in a missing status or as a prisoner of war.

Applicable, especially to men captured by the Japanese in the Philippines and on the Pacific islands, is a provision that men captured between December 7, 1941, and April 20, 1942, and held for a period of at least 30 days extending beyond April 19, 1942, who had less than $5,000 of Government insurance will be granted, as of the date of capture, a sum of insurance sufficient to make an aggregate of $5,000, on which payment of premiums is waived during the period of imprisonment or isolation and 6 months thereafter.

National Service Life Insurance, issued during World War No. 2, pays benefits on a somewhat different basis from the methods of payment under the previous Government insurance issued to men in service during World War No. 1 and during the period of peace that followed, and which these men have continued in force.

Under National Service Life Insurance benefits are paid in monthly installments, and the amounts are governed by the age of the beneficiary:

(a) Where the beneficiary is less than 30 years of age at the time of the death of the insured serviceman, the payments would be $5.51 per month for 240 months for each $1,000 of insurance—$55.10 on a $10,000 policy.

(b) Where the beneficiary is over 30 years of age installments will vary with the age of the beneficiary and will be payable for the life of the beneficiary, but with a guaranty that 120 monthly installments will be paid should the beneficiary die before the end of 10 years after payments were started. On a $10,000 policy the payments would be $39.70 at age 30; $45 at age 40; $53.90 at age 50; $68.10 at age 60; and $91.80 at age 75.

If no beneficiary has been designated, or the designated beneficiary or beneficiaries predecease the insured, payments are authorized by law to survivors, in the following order:

First. Widow or widower;

Second. Child (not including stepchild or illegitimate child);

Third. Parent, or parents in equal shares;

Fourth. Brothers and sisters in equal shares.

If none of these are living to receive payments, no installments are payable to heirs, creditors or legal representatives of the insured or of the first beneficiary.

Suggestion: Since it is necessary for a beneficiary to establish both age and relationship, it is important that beneficiaries or prospective beneficiaries obtain immediately, and keep in a secure place, the necessary evidence—marriage record, birth certificate, and so forth.

APPLICATIONS

Applications for the benefits here mentioned, both pensions and insurance, should be made to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

SIX MONTHS' GRATUITY PAY

Immediately upon notification of the death of a person in service from wounds or disease, not the result of his or her misconduct, there is payable to his widow, child, or dependent relative, a sum equivalent to 6 months' pay at the rate being received on the date of death. This benefit is available first to the widow, if no widow to a child or children, and if neither widow nor child, to any other dependent relative of the person in service previously designated by him or her to receive this pay.

Proper forms on which to make application will be sent to the person entitled from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, as the case may be, when the death of the person in service is officially recorded. Applications should be returned, with any evidence called for, to the office from which blanks were furnished.

SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS

Any amount found in the final settlement of his accounts to be due a person who has died in service, where the amount is less than $500 and no demand is presented by a duly appointed legal representative of the estate, is payable, through the General Accounting Office, Washington, D. C., first to the widow; if no widow to the child or children; if no widow or children to the parents, or if parents are separated to the mother; if one parent deceased, to the survivor; if no widow, child, father, or mother, then to brothers and sisters and children of deceased brothers and sisters. Blanks will be sent from the respective services.

Persons claiming these benefits may call on veterans' service organizations or the Red Cross for assistance in the preparation of applications and assembling needed evidence. If there are any further questions, write to your Congressman, ERRETT P. SCRIVNER, 316 House Office Building, Washington, D. C. He will also be glad to help in presenting claims to the proper agency of the Government.

Information for Servicemen, Veterans, and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, in which I am intensely interested, it has been my privilege to watch the development of the Navy until it has reached its present proportion; namely, the largest and most effective and most potent Navy in the world today. Our Naval Affairs Committee is, naturally, interested in every phase of the war effort and, therefore, has followed the actions of the Committee on Military Affairs with considerable interest. Both of these committees have had major problems of stupendous proportion come before them. Other committees, such as the World War Veterans' Legislative Committee, have studied the problem of enacting veterans' legislation that should be effective and wise.

People everywhere are vitally interested in this legislation because almost every family has someone in the services. I find, upon investigation, that there are a great many in the service, as well as their dependents, who frequently do not get all the benefits to which they are entitled simply because they do not know about them. This is perfectly understandable. There has been so much legislation on this general subject in the last few years that it is difficult for the average person, busy with other matters, to keep fully informed. I have had hundreds of inquiries from my district asking for an outline of the benefits which Congress has made available for servicemen, veterans, and their dependents. I have prepared, in cooperation with the Veterans' Administration, an outline of information concerning the kind and amount of benefits currently available under Federal law, the qualifications therefor, and how to proceed to get them. In this outline, monetary benefits based upon service-connected disability or death are referred to as compensation and pension. The reason for the use of both terms is that under existing laws the service-connected monetary benefits for World War No. 1 veterans and their dependents are termed "compensation," while World War No. 2 service-connected benefits are termed "pension."

Naturally, the summary given here is only an outline. Any citizen in my district can get more detailed information from the Veterans' Administration or from his Congressman about these benefits. The citizens of the Sixth Congressional District of Michigan, which I have the honor to represent, can continue to get help on their individual problems by addressing their inquiries to me as follows: Congressman WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C. Assistance can also be obtained in matters of this kind by contacting the local Red Cross, the American Legion or Auxiliary, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, or similar responsible organizations.

Legislation for veterans of World War No. 1 was very slow in developing, and, therefore, many inequities and injustices resulted. It has been the purpose of the Congress in World War No. 2 to formulate in advance, so far as possible, constructive legislation for our men in service so that on their return to civilian life they will have the benefit of existing laws.

With 11,000,000 men in the military service of our country, scattered in hundreds of bases throughout the world, and with a constantly returning force of honorably discharged soldiers, it behooves this Congress to assist these veterans in every way in order to make the transition period from military to civilian life as easy as possible and to give to these veterans such constructive legislation as will result to their benefit and to the benefit of the Nation itself.

OUTLINE OF BENEFITS FOR SERVICEMEN, VETERANS, AND THEIR DEPENDENTS UNDER EXISTING LAW—COMPENSATION AND PENSION FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH

SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY

Under the veterans' regulations promulgated under the act of March 20, 1933, as amended, honorably discharged veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 are entitled to compensation or pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by such service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10 percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as hand, foot, or eye, blindness, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month. While the World War No. 2 veterans were entitled to these rates following the act of December 19, 1941, they were placed on complete parity under the veterans' regulations by the act of July 13, 1943, Public Law No. 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, with reference to the requirements governing proof of service connection of disability. The latter act also liberalized the regulation concerning the presumption of soundness upon entry into service. Under Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the monthly rates of compensation or pension payable to veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2, including veterans entitled to wartime rates based upon service on or after September 16, 1940, for service-incurred disability, not including special awards and allowances fixed by law, were increased by 15 percent.

In lieu of such pension or compensation, reserve officers called to active duty and officers appointed in the Army of the United States, meeting the requirements of the Army regulations pertaining to retirement of officers of the Regular Establishment, are retired by the War Department, certified to the Veterans' Administration, and their retired pay equal to 75 percent of their base pay is paid by the Veterans' Administration out of the pension appropriation.

NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY

Under Public Law No. 313, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the rate of pension for permanent and total non-service-connected disability, applicable to veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion, the Philippine Insurrection, and World War No. 1, was increased from $40 to $50 per month with an increase to $60 per month where such veterans have been rated permanent and total and in receipt of pension for a continuous period of 10 years, or reach the age of 65 and are permanently and totally disabled. This act also provides that the above pension for non-service-connected disability shall apply to veterans of both World War No. 1 and World War No. 2.

SERVICE-CONNECTED DEATH

The rates of compensation or pension for widows, children, and dependent parents of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 veterans based upon death in service, or service-connected death, are as follows:

Widow, no child	$50
Widow, 1 child (with $13 for each additional child)	65
No widow, but 1 child	25
No widow, but 2 children (with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100)	38
Dependent father and mother:
Each	25
Or 1 only	45

The above rates are contained in Public Law No. 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, July 13, 1943, and constitute a material liberalization of the prior rates.

NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED DEATH

The widow, child, or children of any deceased veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 are entitled to the following rates of compensation if the veteran at the time of death from a non-service-connected cause had a disability incurred in or aggravated by such war service:

Widow but no child	$35
Widow and 1 child (with $5 for each additional child)	45
No widow but 1 child	18
No widow but 2 children (equally divided)	27
No widow but 3 children (equally divided)	36
With $4 for each additional child (the total amount to be equally divided).

Payments are limited to an aggregate of $64 in any one case.

Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, act of May 27, 1944, increased the rates to the above amounts and also included widows and children of World War No. 2 veterans, the law previously having applied only to World War No. 1 veterans.

Claims and effective date of awards: Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred to a Veterans' Administration facility, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged for disability whose claims, with essential service and medical records, are forwarded to area officers for adjudication, the applicant should file claim on proper form which will be supplied upon inquiry addressed to any Veterans' Administration facility or regional office, or to the local representative of the American Red Cross or of a veterans' service organization.

Upon death in service the service department notifies the Veterans' Administration, and claims forms are sent immediately to all known dependents.

GROUPS POTENTIALLY ELIGIBLE FOR PENSIONS

All members of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, the Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, members of the Public Health Service, or of the Coast and Geodetic Survey when ordered to active service with the Army or Navy, or as to United States Public Health Service while serving outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska, and as to Coast and Geodetic Survey when assigned during present war to duty on business of War or Navy Department in areas outside continental United States or in Alaska or coastal areas of the United States as determined by the War and Navy Departments to be of immediate military hazards, are potentially eligible for pensions.

AWARDS TO DATE

Pension payments to veterans of World War No. 2 and their dependents total $37,760,572.78 through March 1944. In addition, retired pay paid by the Veterans' Administrative to Reserve officers called to active duty and officers appointed in the Army of the United States totaled $1,020,137.33 from July 1, 1942, through March 31 1944.

Disbursements for the relief of World War No. 1 veterans and their dependents from 1918 through March 1944 for disability and death compensation or pension, service connected and nonservice connected, total $5,007,029,954.54. In addition, disbursements for World War No. 1 emergency officers' retirement pay through March 31, 1944, totaled $84,889,697.63. Our older veterans are not being forgotten just because there is a new and larger group, as these figures prove.

MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL CARE, PROSTHETIC APPLIANCES, AND DOMICILIARY CARE

Eligibility is extended to any veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 honorably discharged having a service-connected disability requiring such care, treatment, or appliance, or one who was discharged for disability and not dishonorably; also one not dishonorably discharged who is unable to defray his expenses, has tuberculosis or a neuropsychiatric ailment, or disability which requires hospital care.

Dependent upon availability of facilities, eligibility includes any veteran of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 not dishonorably discharged suffering from disability, disease, or defect, and who is in need of such care and is unable to defray the expenses therefor, regardless of whether the disability, disease, or defect was due to service.

CLAIMS

Any person who is to be discharged from active service and who is in need of and entitled to hospitalization by the Veterans' Administration is transferred directly to the Veterans' Administration facility designated to receive him. Claim for all benefits and necessary clinical and service data accompany him, or are filed by the manager if the veteran is insane or incompetent.

All others should file claim for treatment or hospitalization directly with the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office—one or more in each State in the Union except Delaware.

Sixty-four thousand nine hundred and eighty-two veterans of World War No. 2 have been hospitalized by the Veterans' Administration through April 30, 1944. On April 30, 1944, there were 44,967 World War No. 1 veterans and 12,866 World War No. 2 veterans receiving hospitalization and 8,477 World War No. 1 veterans and 196 World War No. 2 veterans receiving domiciliary care from the Veterans' Administration.

While domiciliary care cannot be said to be a part of the rehabilitation process, it is a valuable benefit for those who have reached a permanent state of disability and have no other means of support.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved by the President March 24, 1943, provides—

First, that any person who served in the active military or naval service at any time after December 6, 1941, and prior to the termination of the present war;

Second, and who was honorably discharged;

Third, and who has a disability incurred in or aggravated by such service for which pension is payable under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration or would be but for the receipt of retirement pay;

Fourth, who is in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of such disability, shall be entitled to such vocational rehabilitation as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to fit him for employment consistent with the degree of disablement.

The purpose of rehabilitation is to restore employability lost by virtue of a handicap due to service-incurred disability. In performing the functions imposed upon the Administration by Public Law No. 16, it will be the purpose of the Veterans' Administration to utilize educational institutions and establishments of recognized standing in the training of these disabled veterans into employment and to train each person as near his home as may be possible. In securing employment, a problem which obviously will be very great after the end of the war and perhaps acute after demobilization has been accomplished, every available Federal and State facility will be utilized. Employment of veterans has been accomplished to a considerable extent through the United States Employment Service. It will be the purpose to correlate these activities to the end that those vocationally trained will be graduated into employment opportunities.

While the disabled veteran is in training, his pension, unless it equals or exceeds such amounts, will be increased to $80 per month, if single; $90 per month, if married, with $5 additional for each child, and $10 for each dependent parent. All expenses of training, including necessary transportation, are paid. Medical care is given as required.

CLAIMS

Those persons discharged from the service directly to the Veterans' Administration facilities for hospitalization will have their claims filed and processed, and the question of need for and entitlement to vocational rehabilitation may be given consideration as soon as the individual's physical and mental condition make training feasible. Any other person honorably discharged from the service may make claims for vocational rehabilitation in the claim for pension which may be filed at the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office.

INSURANCE—NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

National service life insurance was provided under the act of October 8, 1940, Public Law No. 801, Seventy-sixth Congress, and liberalizing amendments thereto were enacted during the Seventy-seventh and Seventy-eighth Congresses. A number of other liberalizing proposals are pending in the present Congress and the Veterans' Administration has submitted certain proposed changes found to be justified by studies conducted. Application may be made for not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000 without physical examination prior to the expiration of 120 days from entrance into active service. Thereafter any such person in the active military or naval service may apply if the application be accompanied by acceptable evidence of good health.

APPLICATIONS

Application forms are supplied the service departments, and may be obtained from the commanding officer or designated insurance officer. The applicant may elect to pay premiums in cash, or by allotment of pay. Policies are not issued during the war, but insurance certificate is mailed to the address designated by applicant.

The insurance is against death only, but includes waiver of premiums during total disability existing for more than 6 months, and commencing prior to insured's sixtieth birthday. The policy is a 5-year level premium term policy with rate based upon the American experience table of mortality and 3-percent interest—the Government assuming the extra hazard of the military and naval service and the administrative expense. The insurance is payable only to a widow (widower), child (including a stepchild or illegitimate child, if designated as beneficiary by the insured, parent (including person in loco parentis), brother and sister of the insured; and is payable only in monthly installments. The insured may change the beneficiary designation at any time.

After the policy has been in effect for at least 1 year, while in force it may be converted to an ordinary life, 20-payment life, or 30-payment life policy upon application to the Veterans' Administration without medical examination.

In cases where the person in service died or became totally disabled, or was captured or isolated by the enemy prior to April 20, 1942, and had less than $5,000 insurance in effect, the law provides that gratuitous insurance to an aggregate of $5,000 shall be deemed in effect. Claims for such gratuitous insurance should be filed as soon as possible, because of limitations. In most of these death cases only a widow, child, or dependent parent can claim such insurance.

As of March 30, 1944, over 14,303,291 applications had been received, representing a total amount of nearly $105,596,766,000 of insurance. The average policy was approximately $7,382.60; the average coverage per life, approximately $8,926.74.

The insurance is payable in the event of the death of the insured while the policy is in force to a beneficiary or beneficiaries, which may be designated by the insured, only within the relationship of widow or widower, child, parent, brother, or sister. The proceeds of the policy are payable as an annuity in 240 equal monthly installments of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance to any beneficiary who is under 30 years of age at the time of the death of the insured; otherwise, in continuous monthly installments throughout the lifetime of the beneficiary, with a guaranty of the payment of 120 monthly installments to the surviving relatives of the insured who are within the permitted class of beneficiaries. The amount of the monthly installments under the latter mode of payment is dependent upon the age of the beneficiary at date of death of insured. For example, if the beneficiary is then 40 years old, monthly installment is $4.50 for each $1,000 of insurance; if 50, $5.39; if 60, $6.81; if 70, $8.51.

CLAIMS

All claims for insurance benefits should be addressed to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C., but necessary forms may be secured from the nearest Veterans' Administration facility.

United States Government life (converted) insurance: This insurance can be applied for only by those who served in World War No. 1. No one may have more than $10,000 national service life insurance and Government (converted) insurance combined.

Insurance premiums are guaranteed by Government under Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended: Any person in the active service having a commercial life policy or policies meeting the requirements of said law, article IV, may, upon application to the Veterans' Administration on form supplied the Army and Navy, secure guaranty of premiums, on amount of insurance not in excess of $10,000, while he is in the service during the present war. The insurance premiums so guaranteed by the Government constitute a lien against the policy and must be paid by the company out of any settlement thereof. In the event of the insured's discharge from service, he has a period of 2 years within which to pay the premiums with interest so guaranteed; or otherwise such indebtedness constitutes a loan on the policy with interest and if the amount of such indebtedness exceeds the cash surrender value the policy is automatically canceled and the Government pays the insurer the difference between such cash surrender value and the indebtedness. Forms for making application for such insurance protection are supplied to the War and Navy Departments and may be secured in person or from his commanding officer or other designated official.

As of March 31, 1944, 72,204 applications with insurance totaling $178,189,853.21 have been approved and premiums guaranteed.

INSURANCE UNDER OTHER LAWS

Old-age and survivors insurance is administered by the Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency; unemployment benefits by Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency; retirement by Railroad Retirement Board and Civil Service Commission. Credit for active military or naval service is allowed for civil-service retirement and railroad retirement purposes.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

Mustering-out pay is provided by the act of February 3, 1944, Public Law 225, Seventy-eighth Congress, and is administered by the War and Navy Departments. The amounts are from $100 to $300.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES

Administered by the War and Navy Departments for dependents of those in the service. Your Congressman can supply many details about this subject and help get delayed allotments straightened out for dependents of servicemen.

DOMICILIARY CARE

United States Soldiers' Home, under jurisdiction of the War Department; Naval Home, under jurisdiction of the Navy Department. This is in addition to that provided by the Veterans' Administration.

GUARDIANSHIP

Supervision is maintained in cooperation with the State courts, over payments of any benefits made on account of insane or minor beneficiaries to insure proper application of such benefits.

RETIREMENT PAY

Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard: For officers and enlisted personnel of the Regular Establishment, and reserve components of Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard.

TAXES

Bureau of Internal Revenue: All veterans benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration are exempt from all taxation. Special consideration is shown in the income-tax laws for those in the service.

BURIAL ALLOWANCE

Up to the amount of $100 may be paid for any war veteran, honorably discharged or in receipt of pension or compensation, as to any veteran discharged from the armed forces for disability incurred in line of duty or in receipt of pension for service-connected disability.

A United States flag to drape the casket, subsequently to be turned over to the next of kin, may be furnished as to any veteran, discharged honorably after active service during any war or after serving at least one enlistment or by reason of disability incurred in line of duty. Burial in a national cemtery may be arranged for any honorably discharged veteran or for anyone who dies while in active service, with right of burial therein of his wife or widow, and under certain circumstances, as to his minor children or adult unmarried daughters. The expenses incident to transporting the body of one who has died while in active service, or of a veteran who has died in a Veterans' Administration facility, to the place of burial, are, within limitations, borne by the Government. Headstone or marker—stone or marble—will be furnished for the unmarked grave of any honorably discharged veteran or as to anyone who died while in the active service.

Various benefits, rights, and privileges are also provided as to certain veterans, their dependents, and their organizations under State laws, as per the résumé thereof, as published by the House Committee on Pensions, entitled "State Veterans' Laws."

CIVIL, SPANISH, AND OTHER WARS

Pensions on the basis of age, degree of inability to earn a living, and/or length of service for, first, Civil War veterans in the amount of $75 per month, or $100 if in need of a regular attendant; second, Indian war veterans in amounts ranging from $20 to $60 per month, or $100 if in need of an attendant; and, third, veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, and Boxer Rebellion in amounts ranging from $12 to $75 per month, plus varying amounts if in need of a regular attendant, with total not to exceed $100, but only $20 while being furnished hospital treatment or domiciliary care of the United States or a political subdivision thereof if the veteran has no dependents, provided that as to those in a soldiers' home continually since on or before July 15, 1943, the pension not to exceed $50 shall be continued.

Pensions at lower rates than above are available to veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, and Boxer Rebellion based upon service of 70 days or more, but less than 90 days.

Pension under the Economy Act of March 20, 1933, and the Veterans Regulations promulgated thereunder, as amended, of $50 per month for veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, Boxer Rebellion, or World War No. 1, with 90 days or more of honorable service, or if less than 90 days, if discharged for disability incurred in line of duty, who suffer with permanent total disability, regardless of service connection, if not due to misconduct. Only $8 per month is paid to single men without dependents while being furnished hospital treatment or domiciliary care by a Government agency.

EDUCATION

Congress provided in 1944 that any veteran who served on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to termination of the present war, and who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, and whose education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with by reason of his entrance into the service, or who desires a refresher or retraining course, and who served 90 days or more, is entitled to education at public expense. Application must be made therefor within 2 years after discharge. The Government will pay to the school of the veteran's choice up to $500 per year for tuition and books and will pay to the veteran $50 per month maintenance if single and $75 if married, not to exceed 4 years. Any person who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service is assumed to have had his education interrupted. Veterans must meet the regular entrance and scholarship requirements.

FARM, HOME, AND SMALL BUSINESS OWNERSHIP

The Federal Government, through the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, will guarantee up to 50 percent and as high as $2,000 of any approved loan secured by a veteran from a private or Government source for purchase or operation of a farm, home, or small business. Loans will be interest free the first year and interest will not exceed 4 percent per annum. Applications for this benefit must be made to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs within 2 years after discharge by those who served in the armed forces on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of this war.

JOBS

Congress provided, in 1944, in addition to the foregoing education, farm, home, and small business opportunities, that every veteran of World War No. 2 shall be helped to find a job. The United States Employment Service and the Veterans' Placement Service Board cooperate to fill this responsibility. Veterans are to be registered and every effort made to assist them to find jobs. This provision includes veterans of all wars. Information on how to get the benefits of this provision can be obtained by the veteran from his own local United States Employment Office in his home town or county.

Return to the job after discharge is under jurisdiction of Selective Service; placing in other jobs is under War Manpower Commission; veterans' preference is administered by United States Civil Service Commission and various departments and agencies; job training, rehabilitation (nonservice disability) is administered by Federal Security Agency.

Certain preferences as to Federal civil service, as to physical and age prerequisites, examinations, ratings, appointments, retentions, and reinstatement of Federal employment, are extended to qualified service-connected disabled veterans, the wives of unemployable service-connected or 50-year-aged pensioned veterans, the widows of veterans, and other war veterans and regulars, supplemented by extensive United States Employment Service, and Veterans Employment Service, in every State, for war veterans. Any World War No. 2 veteran who applies therefor within 40 days after discharge is entitled to reinstatement to the Federal position held at time of entering service, or to one of equal grade and pay, or to his previous private employment, where at all practicable for employer, enforceable by order of court, if necessary.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

Congress provided in 1944 that for the first 2 years after a veteran's discharge he will be entitled to unemployment compensation for 52 weeks if he cannot find a job or the Employment Service cannot find one for him. This allowance is $20 per week less that part of the wages payable to him for such week which is in excess of $3. Provisions for unemployment compensation, farm, home, and business ownership and education, are part of the so-called G. I. bill of rights, one of many veterans' bills prepared in 1943–44 by the World War Veterans' Committee.

In passing the G. I. bill of rights Congress has taken the first important step toward providing for returning veterans. I repeat, it is only the first step. Congress has many things yet to do in order to completely round out this all-important program. I again invite the servicemen, veterans, and their dependents to continue to write me concerning their problems. Simply address such correspondence to Congressman WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., because my election to Congress has greatly increased my interest in legislation pertaining to our servicemen, and to our veterans, who, by their splendid ability, loyalty, and patriotism, not only are preserving our own Constitution, and our flag, and our constitutional form of government, but who are bringing to the liberty-loving people of the world their hope for the future.

Uniform Unemployment Compensation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD H. BURTON

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement I made yesterday evening before the Town Meeting of the Air on the subject, Should the Federal Government provide uniform unemployment compensation above State standards during the reconversion period?—the statement being for the negative.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

If the question were, "Do you favor doing all we can to secure full post-war employment?" I would answer, "Yes."

If the question were, "Do you favor unemployment insurance?" I would answer, "Yes."

If the question were, "Do you favor strengthening unemployment insurance now?" I would answer, "Yes; first, by the States increasing their benefits to keep up with wages and living costs in their respective areas; second, by expanding the Federal tax to include pay rolls of one or more employees; third, by including maritime workers and Federal employees; and fourth, by Federal guaranty of the adequacy of State funds to meet their loads."

However, tonight the question is, "Do you favor the Federal Government providing uniform unemployment compensation above State standards during the reconversion period?" To be concrete, this asks, "Do you favor the Kilgore plan that the Senate defeated 49 to 25?" To this I answer, "No."

I voted against the Kilgore plan because, regardless of its purpose, I believe it actually is against the best interests of the worker, the employer, and the public for five good reasons:

1. It tends to federalize the system. By requiring a uniform Nation-wide increase in benefits, it violates the principle of fitting the plan to local wages and living costs. That principle was established by Congress itself in 1935. Forty-eight States, the District of Columbia, Alaska, and Hawaii, have adopted that principle. The officials of these systems are loyal friends of unemployment insurance, and yet they have joined in united opposition to the Kilgore plan.

2. It is not even a good Federal plan. What can be said for the permanent federalization of unemployment insurance does not justify this hybrid plan, which consists of a permanent basis of State insurance plus a temporary addition of Federal benefits. This produces neither a good State plan nor a good Federal plan. It produces duplication of effort, handicaps administration, and adds unnecessarily to the public expense.

3. It introduces relief rather than wage standards. It does this by introducing the number of a worker's dependents as a new measure of the maximum benefits his employers should pay him when unemployed, although not when employed. It also extends benefit payments beyond a reasonable period of unemployment to 2 years after the end of the war. It thus produces something of a pension, payable by employers instead of by the public as a whole. It thus discriminates against industrial production.

4. It relies on the argument that it increases purchasing power. If such a basis for increases beyond reasonable insurance benefits is sound, then the benefits might better be doubled and so double the synthetic prosperity. The fallacy is that when payments are justified merely as providing purchasing power they are purely inflationary. They are paid for nothing. Whatever value they have comes from value arbitrarily taken away from someone else by taxation or by borrowing. Any resulting activity is false prosperity. It leads directly to deficits and depression rather than to solvency and prosperity.

5. Finally, the Kilgore plan defeats its own purpose by overreaching itself. It raises the benefits out of the field of reasonable insurance into that of subsidized idleness. By offering more for not working than for working, it substitutes the dole for wages. It blocks the roads to reemployment, recovery, and higher standards of living. It makes a reasonable rate unreasonable.

To make this clear, I recite the terms of the Kilgore plan. Within its maximum rates, which exceed those of every State, it offers to a worker, completely unemployed at suitable work and wages, until 2 years after the end of the war, 75 percent of his peak wartime weekly pay. This peak wartime weekly pay generally includes at least 48 hours of pay. Eight of these are at overtime rates of time-and-a-half, making an extra 4 hours of pay, or an actual peak pay of 52 hours a week. Seventy-five percent of 52 hours is 39. The worker will compare this with the 40 hours of pay he would receive for a full week of post-war work. He would thus receive only 1 hour more of pay a week by working 40 hours than by working none. Even this 1 hour margin of pay would disappear in his additional expense for transportation, food, work clothes and taxes because wages are taxable and unemployment benefits are tax free.

In other words, the Kilgore plan, at the employers' and public's expense, puts a cash premium on unemployment at the moment when the best interests of the worker, employer and the public call for every possible encouragement of employment and production.

For these reasons, the right answer to the Kilgore plan and to the question tonight is "No."

Dewey as a Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interesting editorial entitled "Dewey as a Farmer" published in the Wichita (Kans.) Eagle, which is edited by Victor Murdock.

Mr. Dewey has never claimed to be a farmer but nevertheless has made a success of farming in New York State. His farm has shown a profit every year, even though it has been largely a side line.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEWEY AS A FARMER

With President Roosevelt nominated by the Democrats the Presidential campaign becomes a race between neighbors. Candidate Dewey's farm home is a scant 30 miles from the Roosevelt estate at Hyde Park. The Dewey place consists of 300 acres. An additional 120 acres is rented. The home tract had been rented at first for a period of 2 years. Five years ago it was purchased for $30,000.

The Deweys like to call their place a going concern. By every standard of agricultural measurements it is just that. It produces a ton of milk a day, sold to the local creamery. Its grain crops are diversified. There are ample tracts of woodland and pasture. The place is highly improved, with modern buildings for all requirements. A substantial profit is shown each year.

Dewey insists he is not a working farmer. He refuses to capitalize politically by being pictured pitching hay or wearing funny garb. He is too busy with his duties as Governor of New York to spend much time on his land, but goes there at every opportunity. He has a love for the land, typical of the normal American. That he has made a success of farming, even though it has been largely a side line, is quite evident.

The Atlantic Charter—Three Years Old and Already in the Discard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Hastings (Nebr.) Daily Tribune, of August 16, 1944, which is one of the leading papers of the Middle West. The editorial is as follows:

THE ATLANTIC CHARTER—3 YEARS OLD AND ALREADY IN THE DISCARD

President Roosevelt's impetuous approach to international problems and the disappointing results that frequently ensue probably are no more pointedly illustrated than by the state of disrepair into which the Atlantic Charter has now fallen. The charter was 3 years old this week. Instead of being a lusty and arm-swinging youngster it already has faded into a decrepit document of mobile doggerel, lofty in theme perhaps but abased because of its impracticability. If the charter is a sample of what is going to happen after Mr. Roosevelt gets up from having been at the table with Mr. Churchill and Mr. Stalin we have grave fears for whatever world formula is yet to be evolved.

For without much doubt the Atlantic Charter, signed with such a flourish of trumpeting, has become simply an incidental note in history. The two men responsible for it, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill, have differed over what the eight points in it mean and how they should be applied. There has been a great feeling in the minds of people that Mr. Roosevelt and only Mr. Roosevelt is competent to sit about the same board with Stalin and Churchill. Actually it would appear that whatever else Mr. Roosevelt may do he often accomplishes little at the meetings of the titans other than to give sanction to plans the other two already have in mind. It was so at the charter meeting in the Atlantic, at Cairo, at Quebec, emphatically so at Teheran.

But to return to the charter itself. It pledges no aggrandizement, territorial or otherwise, and no territorial changes except as the people affected wish. It guarantees all peoples the right to choose their own governments. It gives access to all states to the trade and raw materials of the world. It sets up international collaboration in the international economic field. It seeks to establish peace in which men may live in freedom from fear and want. It guarantees freedom of the seas. It calls for disarmament of aggressor nations, encouragement of world disarmament, and eventual abandonment of the use of force in world affairs.

But since 1941 this agenda of noble aims has been shot full of holes by act of its signatories. In Poland and in Yugoslavia the people have not been allowed to choose their own government, and will not after the war, because Russia already has set up regimes favorable to it—the Partisans. Mr. Roosevelt has acceded. The charter speaks out against aggrandizement, yet Mr. Stalin has made it clear by word and deed that eastern Europe is his; the only difference is that his is a political aggrandizement and not an actual military one. Our collaboration in the economic field has been to open the doors of the United States Treasury and to assume burdens that will add to the financial obligations of the American people. In trade and raw materials, Mr. Churchill personally inserted in the charter, and has called attention to it since, a provision that Britain would preserve its empire system. He obtained from Mr. Roosevelt, he told Commons, assurance that "Britain was no more committed to abolition of imperial trade preference than the United States Government was committed to abolition of its protective tariffs." In other words British business as usual.

As to the eventual abandonment of the use of force in international affairs, this country and every one of its allies is already anticipating the maintenance of powerful land armies, fleets, and air arms. For what purpose? For use in international affairs, of course. What else? We are not quarreling with that; we simply point out that it isn't consistent with the rosy glow which surrounded the creation of the charter back in August of 1941.

The charter was conceived and executed in one of those bursts of enthusiasm which offer wonderful spectacles of hope but which go to pieces in actual performance. It is unfortunate, for the charter for a time held out a robust rainbow to mankind. What will be the fate of other glorious documents to come out of the international playing about with the destinies of nations? Will they, too, be tossed off with airy naivete and then quietly allowed to perish? Is the celebrated peace table, for which Mr. Roosevelt is now running so hard, going to produce another charter? There is plenty of room for wonderment.

Production and the Accomplishments of American Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, as Monday will be Labor Day and the Senate will not then be in session, I think it appropriate that I should offer for the RECORD today a few figures showing the magnificent contribution of American labor during the war in bringing about the marvelous production which has astonished the world and made possible the victorious efforts of our armed forces on every battle front. I ask unanimous consent that the table be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Statistics on labor in the war effort

PRODUCTION

(a) Production per man-hour taking 1940 as 100 percent, in manufacturing industries:

	Percent
1940	100
To June 1944	110

(b) Agricultural production taking the period 1935–39 as a base of 100 percent:

1940	110
To June 1944	132

(c) Production by commodities for month and years indicated:

	June 1940	June 1944
Aircraft	$60,000,000	$1,650,000,000
Munitions	$150,000,000	$5,400,000,000
Shipbuilding	$20,000,000	$1,000,000,000
Steel, short tons	5,700,000	7,200,000
Aluminum, pounds	24,000,000	133,000,000

Surplus War Equipment for Farm Use

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JED JOHNSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to a very timely editorial from the fluent pen of my old-time friend Hon. J. C. Nance, an able legislator and one of the leading newspapermen of Oklahoma. In this editorial he calls attention to the importance of soil conservation and flood control. I hope that before the legislation providing for disposal of surplus property is finally agreed upon by both Houses of Congress and enacted into law, that a definite provision will be made to make surplus war machinery available to the Nation's farmers, and especially to organized soil-conservation districts, where there is much demand and real need for such machinery now.

The editorial mentioned is as follows:

WAR TOOLS FOR PEACETIME PROJECTS

How shall the Government dispose of surplus war equipment? What methods shall be provided for a distribution of this highly important equipment to the places in the Nation where it will serve the most useful purpose in post-war projects? Will the State of Oklahoma be able to obtain a proportionate allotment of such equipment for post-war projects? These are questions that should engage the thought and attention of the average citizen of Oklahoma interested in a great program of development in this State following the day of victory on the battle fronts.

Many war machines can be converted to peacetime purposes. The Army and Navy are now manufacturing many modern machines which will be just as useful in peacetime as they are in wartime. These machines will not all be consumed in battle. Many machines will never reach the battle front. If provision is made to divert these machines to every place and for every useful purpose after the war the Government will be able to recapture the investment made in such machines. These machines will be needed in many worth-while projects. The question is How shall these machines be obtained for such projects?

This Nation, and particularly Oklahoma, is engaged in a great soil-saving and soil-building program. The Federal planning and resources board is engaged right now in mapping plans for post-war flood control. No other projects are more important or more valuable to the general welfare of the Nation. The greatest dividends to posterity will come from such projects. And the program will furnish unlimited employment to returning veterans. Unemployment can be solved with that program. It is vital to the stability and progress of the Nation.

One of the smartest suggestions in connection with the utilization of war equipment in post-war work comes from J. E. Palmertree, a tenant farmer residing on the Hine farm west of Purcell. It was Palmertree who proposed that the legislature make provisions for the State to acquire surplus Army and Navy equipment for use in all types of projects in this State. Remembering the policy of the Government in disposing of war equipment following the last war, Palmertree expresses the fear that unless the legislature made provisions for the State to proceed to obtain that equipment it would be sold to speculators and wrecking corporations just as it was sold following the last war. The average individual or group of individuals are not financially able to bid in the equipment. It invariably goes to the big corporations with unlimited finance. The same policy may be followed this year unless sentiment is created to influence the National Congress in revising such policy.

Among the projects mentioned by Palmertree were soil conservation, flood control, lakes, ponds, low-water dams, terracing, etc. He pointed out that the Army soon will be disposing of tractors, bulldozers, trucks, power shovels, cranes, and hundreds of other machine and hand tools. All these tools and machines can be used in the respective counties of the State for the above-mentioned projects together with road and bridge building, the construction of public buildings, etc. If the State and all its subdivisions step into the picture and make request for these surplus items, they can all be used to great advantage and the Nation will be able to save every dollar invested in such equipment.

Palmertree has made a suggestion that is sure to receive the most earnest consideration of the legislature. It is a movement that should eventually reach the National Congress.

The St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Peace Job No. 1," published in the Chicago Daily News of August 25, 1944, favoring the prompt completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEACE JOB NO. 1

The daily parade of warcraft of many classes down the Chicago River has become so commonplace that it takes a very unusual type to bring office workers to the windows of the buildings lining the river. Hardly anyone seems to have remarked the recent passage of seven oil tankers bound for the Gulf to enter the oil-carrying trade between Venezuela and this country.

These oceangoing ships, each 350 feet long, were too big for the locks in the St. Lawrence canals, and therefore went by the Lakes to the Gulf route, although it is not as deep as the existing 14-foot draft of the bottleneck canals around the rapids of the St. Lawrence.

Despite all the obstructions that have been thrown in its way, Chicago continues to reach out for blue water like a heliotrope seeking the sun. Speed the day of peace when work can begin in earnest on the St. Lawrence seaway.

The job is ready to go, when materials and manpower are available. Both Presidential candidates as Governors of New York worked for the seaway, so the days of political sabotage are over.

Freedom of Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Bergen Evening Record, published at Hackensack, N. J., on August 23, 1944. The editorial is as follows:

Richard F. Frankensteen, one of the Nation's best known spokesmen for that far-to-the-left labor organization known as the C. I. O., has appeared before the Federal Communications Commission to demand that radio station WHKC of Columbus, Ohio, be barred from the air because it allegedly permitted programs on its station opposed to organized labor and the New Deal. The station denies the allegation, but why it bothers to do so is beyond this writer's comprehension.

It seems to him—and it should seem to every citizen of this self-governing democracy, in which the people are the masters and their elected officials are the servants—that it is high time for the Congress of all the people to notify the Federal Communications Commission that the United States Constitution, that sacred covenant among the people and between them and their transiently elected governments, still lives, especially the first amendment thereof. And it might also be timely for the Congress to ask itself and to answer the question: What is the C. I. O., what is the New Deal, and what have they done or tried to do to the most progressive and the most productive nation in the world?

Perhaps it has forgotten that the C. I. O. followed the party line by sabotaging America's rearmament program when Communist-beloved Russia was a partner of Hitler's Nazis prior to his historic double-cross, a device to which the C. I. O. is not an entire stranger. It struck; it sat down; it seized munition plants, and stopped production; and it imported to the United States of America the Communist technique by superimposing mob rule on United States Government by law.

Here in Bergen County it had the effrontery to take over main State highways to the exclusion of the motoring public who paid for them; it would not permit local residents access to side streets on which their homes were located, and it called this writer a nervy ——————— because he quietly but insistently asserted his rights as a taxpayer. Yes, according to real American standards and precedents the C. I. O. stunk then, and when it attempts, through its Frankensteen, to bar criticism of itself or its patron, the New Deal, over the air waves, in violation of our Constitution's first amendment, it still stinks.

And what of the New Deal? Admittedly it has distributed lavishly the accumulated savings of the people for the benefit of that euphemistic individual called the forgotten man. But whoever he is, it has done so not with the personal funds (largely inherited but not earned) of its founder or of his political satellites or of his collegiate textbook theorists who have made a good living at the public trough during the past 12 years. All of them have moved in their mysterious way their wonders to perform with the accumulated savings of generations of American men and women who were taught at their mothers' knee that thrift and frugality are virtues instead of the vices which the New Deal and its C. I. O. affiliate have for years tried to make them appear. Yes, the C. I. O. has blackjacked increased wages from employers for its members and increased the cost of living for all the other partners in our joint civic enterprise called the United States of America; and the New Deal has squandered and lavished the accumulated capital (hard-earned savings) of a people in quadrennial campaigns for Presidential ballots in a self-delusive and evanescent dream of transient political power which, after our foreign enemies are beaten into complete submission is going to be our nightmare.

After that pitiful aftermath of political spending and electing, of higher wages and higher costs of living, there will remain the wreckage for a chastened people and a sober Congress to contemplate and to resurrect from the ashes of their political folly. But whatever their fiscal and economic vicissitudes, whatever the future purchasing value of their Government bonds bought under neighborhood solicitation and national high pressure, the sacred and revered Constitution of the United States must always be a living covenant among our people. Neither a discredited New Deal nor an ideologically foreign C. I. O. must be permitted in any circumstances to scrap that.

And the Congress should start now its preservation for posterity by informing the Federal Communications Commission in forceful statutory language that freedom of speech on the platform, in the press, and on the air still lives, and must always continue to live in the land for which past generations of American freemen laid their lives on the altar of constitutional principles, just as the present generation of our valorous sons is doing now on foreign battlefields.

America will doubtless win this war, both in Europe and in Asia, but it will have lost the peace if it permits the C. I. O. or anything else to scrap any part of its constitutional birthright. Congressional statemanship can preserve it, but selfish partisanship can destroy it and convert a free people into a nation of slaves to the state.

Need for Mechanical Corn Pickers in Kansas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK CARLSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a letter I wrote Mr. G. F. Geisler, director of the western division of the A. A. A. regarding the need for an increased number of mechanical corn pickers in Kansas. I am also including a letter received from Mr. Geisler this morning, which gives a full report on the corn-picker situation. This year Kansas has prospects of producing one of the largest corn crops in history. Corn picking requires much hand labor unless we can get corn-picking machines. The manpower of our State is so reduced because of military induction and workers in defense plants that I do not see how we can harvest this large crop without the assistance of these machines. I have discussed this matter with officials in the Department of Agriculture, the War Production Board, and War Food Administration, urging them to give every consideration possible to increasing our allocation.

The letters follow:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 23, 1944.

Mr. G. F. GEISSLER,
Director, Western Division,
South Agriculture Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GEISSLER: Present indications are that Kansas will produce one of the largest corn crops in history this year. There are two reasons largely responsible for this. First, the State has had an abundant supply of rainfall, and second, an increased acreage was planted to corn in the northern part of the State because of weather and soil conditions last fall at wheat-planting time.

While at home this summer I visited with a large number of farmers and corn growers who advised me it looked as though it would be impossible to get this corn harvested unless our section was able to secure a large number of mechanical corn pickers. Since returning to Washington I have received a number of letters regarding the situation and am convinced something must be done to relieve the critical labor shortage. As I advised you yesterday, I feel certain this matter must have the full consideration of the Department of Agriculture, the War Production Board, and any other agency which is in a position to give assistance.

I would appreciate very much any suggestions you might have and will be most pleased to cooperate with you in any way I can.

With kindest regards.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK CARLSON.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT AGENCY,
Washington, D. C., August 31, 1944.

Hon. FRANK CARLSON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CARLSON: This is in reply to your letter of August 23, in which you report of the urgent need for mechanical corn pickers in Kansas.

All machinery companies manufacturing corn pickers have been informed of the large corn acreage and the prospects for heavy yields in Kansas and other Great Plains States. Manufacturers are requested to fill the total corn-picker allocations in Kansas and other Great Plains States from their earliest production.

States in addition to Kansas for which this preferential delivery has been requested are: North Dakota, Montana, South Dakota, Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma, and Missouri. Increased corn acreages and prospective bumper yields in these States are similar to the conditions existing in Kansas. Because of the spotty drought conditions and a more favorable relative inventory of corn pickers on farms in the major corn-producing States, the request for early delivery to the States mentioned appears justified.

The request to the manufacturers emphasized the importance of filling the quotas for the above States before the season begins so that the pickers could be utilized to the maximum.

We have made repeated attempts to secure an additional allocation of corn pickers for Kansas, but this is not possible as the entire scheduled production has been allocated. It is believed, however, that material relief will result by the State receiving its entire allocation of corn pickers at the start of the season. It also means that any reduction in the production of corn pickers through failure on the part of manufacturers to meet their production schedules will have to be absorbed by States receiving later delivery. We believe that such States are in a better position to stand any reduction that might occur.

For your information, Kansas was allocated 485 corn pickers by manufacturers from the 80 percent of their 1944 scheduled production which they distribute without direction of the War Food Administration. Kansas was allocated 308 corn pickers from the 20-percent National Reserve by the direction of the W. F. A., making a total allocation of 793 corn pickers for the year compared with a total allocation of 375 for 1943.

Your concern in this matter is appreciated and we assure you that we will keep in close touch with the situation and will render every possible assistance.

G. F. GEISSLER,
Director, Western Division.

Sidney Hillman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED E. BUSBEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, 4 years ago the new dealers in the Democratic Party had their own hatchet men going about the country purging men in public office who would not bow to their dictates. In this campaign Earl Browder and the Communists, along with Sidney Hillman and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, have joined forces to relieve the administration of this dirty, filthy job.

The following biography is taken from Who's Who in America, volume 23, 1944–45, Two Years, and in accordance with the custom of the compilation of Who's Who in America, Sidney Hillman has this to say about himself:

Hillman, Sidney, labor leader; born Zagare, Lithuania, March 23, 1887; son Schmuel and Judith (Faikin) Gilman; came to United States at age of 20; received rabbinical education; married Bessie Abramowitz, 1916; children—Philoine (Mrs. Milton Fried), Selma (Mrs. Irving Lerner); department under United Garment Workers, at Hart Schaffner & Marx, Chicago, 1911–14; chief clerk under Brandeis' protocol in Cloakmakers' Union, New York, February–October, 1914; president, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America since 1915; chairman of board, Amalgamated Bank of New York; director, Amalgamated Trust & Savings Bank, Chicago; led strike, Hart Schaffner & Marx, which resulted in collective agreement with that firm, 1910; strike in New York which achieved 48-hour week, 1916, the 44-hour week, 1919; organized Rochester market, 1918; organized Chicago market, 1919; visited Russia, 1921, and made agreement for transmission of American dollars; made agreement with Arthur Nash Co., Cincinnati, 1925; organized Philadelphia market, 1929; built cooperative houses in New York; established unemployment insurance fund, Rochester, Chicago, and New York; member of Labor Advisory Board, N. R. A., 1933, National Industrial Recovery Board, 1935; member, Advisory Board, National Youth Administration, 1935; reached first national collective bargaining agreement in men's clothing industry in 1937; member textile and apparel industry committees, Fair Labor Standards Board, 1938; vice president, Congress of Industrial Organizations; chairman, Textile Workers' Organization Committee, 1937–39; chairman, executive council, Textile Workers' Union of America, since May 1939; appointed labor member, National Defense Advisory Commission, 1940; became associate director-general, O. P. M. and director, Labor Division of same, 1941; appointed to Supply Priorities and Allocation Board, September 1941, director, Labor Division, W. P. B. 1942; member, Academy Political and Social Science, home, 237 East Twentieth Street, New York, N. Y.; office, Social Security Building, Washington, D. C., also 15 Union Square, New York, N. Y.

Mr. Speaker, because Sidney Hillman is the spearhead in this purge and smear campaign, the following facts concerning him, which he did not include in his biography in Who's Who in America should be of interest to the voters.

Sidney Hillman was born in Zagare, Lithuania—then a part of Russia; was a leader of the Russian Revolution of 1905 in Zagare, according to the Communist press; was president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, but never a worker at his trade; a writer of a book on the Russian Revolution, entitled "Reconstruction of Russia and the Task of Labor;" conferred with Lenin in 1922 regarding the establishment of the Russian-American Industrial Corporation, of which Hillman was president; donated $3,000 to the Jewish Communist paper, Freiheit, in 1921; head of the Hillman-Communist coalition, together with VITO MARCANTONIO in the American Labor Party in New York.

It is very encouraging to read in the press every day that officers and members of the C. I. O. are beginning to realize Sidney Hillman's real objective is not in the cause of labor, but a determined effort to take over this Government of ours, to perpetuate Mr. Roosevelt and all his satellites in power until such time as they can completely take over and abolish our representative form of Government.

The question before the American people today is a very simple one. It resolves itself into the following proposition. This is your America. Do you want to turn it over to Sidney Hillman? Or, in other words, do you want Sidney Hillman to rule this country?

Labor Day, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, in all the criticism to which American labor has been exposed by reason of wildcat strikes and the active intervention of new factors into the national political scene, many Americans may have overlooked the substantial contribution which labor has made to the war effort. The high wages paid, the tremendous publicity given to unauthorized work stoppages and the frequently unfavorable reaction which such a combination inevitably produces obscure the record but they do not change it.

American labor on Labor Day 1944 can look back upon a year of work well done, of an achievement in production which has never before been conceived, much less performed. Many of the criticisms which have been leveled at our working organizations will prove in years to come to be merely the same symptoms of "growing pains" which have taken place in the evolution of other great developments in the social structure of the world.

It is easy to be critical. It is difficult to maintain an objective attitude towards those who occasionally exploit their position in labor organizations for personal reasons. Our working people themselves resent such activities. They will correct these abuses themselves in the not too distant future.

Fifth Anniversary of the Invasion of Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN GORSKI
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. GORSKI. Mr. Speaker, today is the fifth anniversary of the invasion of Poland and the beginning of the sixth year of the Second World War. During these 5 years there were dark periods for the Allied Nations and the fate of democracy hung in the balance. In the early days of this war Hitler roared his threats at all freedom-loving people, and the European nations trembled at his threats. He made promises to all of them that he did not want or desire their lands, but invaded one by one or forced them into what he called the new order—his order. There were times in the past 5 years when the nations fighting the Nazis were fighting with their backs to the wall, and the outlook for freedom and democracy was very dark and gloomy.

When the Nazis were winning battles Hitler and his murderous hordes were perpetrating every imaginable crime on their helpless victims, they tried to overcome the spirit of freedom and loyalty of the conquered people by brutality and terror so despicable as to shock the decency of the civilized world. No nation conquered or none of the people were spared, and no mercy was shown to women or children, among those who suffered most were the people of Poland, the nation first to defy his might, and the first to suffer the tortures and brutalities of the barbarous and inhuman Nazis. They forced them out of their homes, took away their food, imprisoned them on the slightest pretext, shot and murdered them by the thousands in the presence of their loved ones, starved the women and innocent children, but with all of these tortures they did not in all of these 5 years of war, produce one Pole who would collaborate with them, and today the people of Poland still defy them, and the love of freedom and democracy is stronger than ever, their soldiers are fighting gloriously side by side with the soldiers of the United Nations.

Today the beginning of the sixth year of this global war, the situation is different, the United Nations are winning on every battle front, and the Nazis see defeat staring them in the face, their leaders know what their fate is, and are beginning to spread propaganda with the idea and hope of staving off total defeat and unconditional surrender.

As this war draws to a close and the Nazis see that they cannot win, and they will resort to one of their favorite tricks by spreading propaganda to soften public opinion and thereby arouse a sentiment in their behalf so that they may not be dealt with too harshly, and in this endeavor they will again call upon their sympathizers to help spread their propaganda among the people of the United Nations. I am sure we will not be misled. We will never forget the innocent hostages whom they murdered and the crimes they committed. I hope that peace will come soon, but we do not want a peace that will give the Nazis a chance to rearm in a short time and again plunge the world in another war. We want a just peace, but with that just peace those who were responsible for the atrocities committed on the people of the conquered countries are brought to justice and punished according to the crimes which they were responsible for, and they should be tried in the countries where the crimes were committed. This would be a deterrent on war criminals. Now that victory is within our grasp, let us bring about such a peace that this country will never again be forced to marshall all its manpower and its resources to maintain our democracy. Let us seal the fate of tyrants for all time.

Poland Pleads for Help—Cordell Hull Warns German Barbarians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, the 1st of September 1944 is the fifth anniversary of the brutal Nazi attack on Poland and the beginning of the sixth year for the Polish people of the most terrible horrors and suffering that the world has ever witnessed. For the first time since Hitler had come to power in Germany, German aggression met armed resistance from the Poles, exactly 5 years ago today. Five years ago the German military colossus pounced upon Poland with all of its military power and might. Poland was a young nation, struggling through its reconstruction after World War No. 1, after having 150 years of Russo-German-Austrian occupation.

For 35 days the whole world followed the events of the unequal struggle. The sacrifice of Poland in September 1939 was to save democracy. President Roosevelt called Poland the inspiration of the holy Allied cause.

The Polish campaign of 1939 was one long succession of heroism and sacrifice. The Polish soldier and the civilian population without regard to race, creed, or origin fulfilled their obligations to their motherland.

In the Polish campaign, which German military publications termed the most difficult of all campaigns to date, the Battles of Kutno, Lwow, and Kock—where the Polish Army was forced to surrender for lack of ammunition on October 5—stand out. All remember likewise the heroic defense of Hel and Westerplatte, Modlin, and Warsaw.

After 5 years Warsaw is again fighting. After 5 years Warsaw has again accepted the challenge to uneven battle with the German might. As 5 years ago the Warsaw Poles heeded the call of their mayor and defender of the city, Stefan Starzynski, likewise now at the command of General Bor they have taken up arms in open uprising to break the chains of their German bondage. Now as then they fight without outside assistance; now as then the Polish underground and the civilian population are fighting tanks with guns and bottles of gasoline.

The defense of Warsaw 5 years ago and the struggle for Warsaw's liberation today are not two isolated facts of Polish participation in this war. They are but two symbolic facts of an unending succession of sacrifice and struggle.

Polish resistance has persisted from the very first day of the war. It has persisted inside Poland and beyond her borders. Ever since the moment when the Germans treacherously crossed the Polish frontiers on September 1 the Poles have been fighting.

As soon as the war was officially ended in Poland guerrilla units which were to become the nucleus of a great underground army were made up of Polish soldiers and civilians. At the same time, General Sikorski, 2 days after the fall of Warsaw, formed a Polish Army in France. This army numbered some 80,000 men and consisted of four and a half infantry divisions, an armored brigade, and the now-famous Carpathian Brigade. The first and second divisions of General Sikorski's army participated in the Battle of France; the Carpathian Brigade fought in Norway and was victorious in the battle for Narvik.

A large part of the Polish Army in France was successfully evacuated to England after the former collapsed. Poland's Army in Britain now numbers 30,000 men and boasts an armored division, a parachute brigade, and other units. A Polish women's unit, counterpart of the American WAC, has also been organized and numbers 5,000 women. The armored division is now fighting in France, together with the American, British, and Canadian Armies.

Another Polish Army was organized on Russian soil under General Anders following the signing of the Polish-Russian treaty in July 1941, and the release of a large number of Polish prisoners of war in that country. At the request of the Soviet Government, it was transferred to the Middle East, where it was equipped and grew to form a separate army corps with the Carpathian Brigade, which had been expanded to a division. This corps now numbers 75,000 well-trained and superbly armed men. They have fought in the Libyan campaign—Tobruk, El Gazala—and are now fighting in Italy, where they have already become famous for their victories at Monte Cassino and Ancona. A second Polish army has recently been organized in Russia, composed of the remainder of the Polish prisoners of war in that country, and this army is now fighting alongside their Russian ally.

Poland's air force, which grew out of squadrons set up in France in 1940 and evacuated to England in June of that year, played a glorious role in the Battle of Britain. Her crews destroyed 219 German planes at that time, in addition to 39 probably destroyed.

Up to May 1, 1944, the official record of the Polish Air Force operating from bases in the British Isles contains the following entries: 620 enemy aircraft known to be destroyed; 167 probably destroyed; 214 badly damaged.

Polish bomber squadrons have taken part in 893 operations of a varied character in which a total of 7,056 sorties were made. They dropped 15,547,771 pounds of bombs and mines.

At present the Polish Air Force numbers 12,000 men and ranks fourth in size among others of the United Nations—after the United States, Great Britain, and Russia. It consists of 14 squadrons and is larger than the air forces of France, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Yugoslavia, and Belgium combined.

The Polish Navy has been fighting since the beginning of the war by the side of the British Royal Navy. It took part in the evacuation of Dunkerque, in the attack on the Bismarck, the landing at Dieppe, in the Battle of the Atlantic, and operations off the north African coast, Sicily, and Italy. It now consists of one cruiser, six destroyers, three submarines, and three coastal craft. Poland's merchant fleet is likewise in constant service on all seas and has carried much land material in convoys to Russia and to various other battlefields.

The largest Polish military command, however, is to be found in occupied Poland. This is the underground or home army. It is divided into two groups: (a) Operational units, in which soldiers are used in actual skirmishes with the invader; and (b) the regular army, whose men undergo constant training and are strictly subject to the military discipline of the organization.

The operational group consists of 250,000 men, while the number of men in the Regular Army is much higher.

In spite of handicaps as an army whose operational theater is occupied territory, the home army has been able, through its activities, to immobolize in Poland the following German forces:

First. Five full divisions; that is, over 60,000 men for special assignment, stationed at several points throughout the country.

Second. Fourteen divisions; that is, about 160,000 men on garrison duty.

Third. Military Nazi Party formations; in this, 57,250 S. S. men, 95,000 party policemen, and so forth.

Fourth. Formations of railroad, road, and frontier guards; over 200,000 men.

Fifth. About 180,000 civilians of military age doing military service in armed organizations, such as the German Self-Defense and the German Security—Sonderdienst—for defense against the Polish underground movement.

The home army is for this reason of tremendous significance in the total Allied war effort.

In conclusion, two figures should be borne in mind:

Poland's losses in the war:
Losses on the battlefield	900,000
Losses in occupied Poland	5,700,000
Total	6,600,000

SECOND BATTLE OF WARSAW

When the Russian Armies approached the gates of Warsaw, the Poles sensed freedom and liberation. They desired to join in the fight to free Warsaw, just as the French people of Paris desired to join in the fight to free Paris.

This is no time to argue that the uprising was premature. Only such people as had suffered for 5 long years under the brutal and savage Huns have the right to discuss the question of prematureness. Since the end of July, the Germans had been using Warsaw as a key supply base and communication center for their eastern front. At the same time, they began a new reign of terror in the Polish capital by ordering civilians to evacuate the city, and by intensifying the number of mass executions and arrests. On top of that four German armored divisions were scheduled to pass through Warsaw on their way to reinforce the collapsing eastern front.

General Bor and the Polish Home Army rose to stop these German divisions, as well as to put an end to the persecution of Warsaw civilians.

At 5 p. m. on August 1 the Polish forces struck in an effort to occupy the vital central part of the city along with the main streets that lead to the three bridges across the Vistula to Praga, the eastern suburb. General Bor reported to London that this uprising of the Polish Home Army saved 1,000 internees and prisoners of war from deportation set for July 31. Many of these prisoners, his report continued, were officers and men of the Royal Air Force, shot down on missions over Germany. Saved from the Gestapo, they now fight side by side with their Polish allies.

Despite their desperate shortage of weapons and ammunition, the inability of the Allies to supply them and the stalemate on the eastern front, General Bor and his patriot army have miraculously held out for 4 weeks solely through their unparalleled heroism and wise strategy. Thus, a band of 20,000 emaciated, ill-armed and poorly equipped Poles held at bay the "superman" Wehrmacht that had so boastfully conquered all Poland 5 years previously. This unexpected insurrection greatly aided the Red Army.

During the first days, General Bor took the offensive, but as German resistance on the eastern front stiffened and Allied aid was necessarily limited, the Poles were forced to assume defensive positions in various parts of the city. Appeals were sent to both London and Moscow for military aid and supplies.

Both Britain and Russia were given full details of the plans and operations of the Polish Home Army.

Traffic on all three bridges across the Vistula was at first blocked, but during the first week the Germans succeeded in taking first the Poniatowski bridge, most southern of the three. Not until August 6 were they able to take the middle one, the Kierbedz bridge. In order to do so the Germans had to burn every building along the approaches to the vital bridge.

Desperate by the 9th of August, the Germans pressed two armored trains into service on the track that connects all the railway stations in Warsaw. These finally cleared a way to the third most northern bridge that carries both motor and rail traffic. One of these trains shelled Polish positions in a barrage that lasted 11 hours on the night from August 10 to 11, but in the end the home army rallied to retake the Stawki district. The Germans resorted to the most brutal methods of warfare. Sections of the city held by the patriots were fired by incendiary bombs, while all the fire-fighting equipment as well as most of the first-aid supplies in the city were confiscated. Polish prisoners were not treated according to international law. Nevertheless, the Poles held, and valuable time as well as armed forces and equipment sorely needed by the enemy on the eastern front were used up in this latest Battle of Warsaw.

General Bor still held large and important parts of the city that lead to these bridges as well as several vital suburbs. The Old City quarter of Warsaw, that section lying along the central river front, was held despite fierce German counterattacks. The northern suburb of Zoliborz, one of the most fiercely contested areas, the Stawki sector with its vital freight assembly yards for the Danzig railway station still held by the Germans were all totally or in part controlled by General Bor.

So desperate did the German positions become in the Polish capital that the Wehrmacht had to rush six- and eight-barrelled mortars, tanks, and heavy artillery into the fray. German gunboats on the Vistula sent a searing cross-fire into the Polish sectors. General Bor ordered the underground outside of Warsaw to strike at general reinforcements flowing into the city, as well as to enter the city to strengthen Polish garrisons there.

At the end of the second week of hostilities, General Bor reported to London that if 400 Allied aircraft, 200 combat planes, and 200 transports with supplies were to come over Warsaw, the Polish home army would win the desperate battle within 24 hours.

On the 11th of August, following unsuccessful artillery barrages, the Germans hopefully sent an ultimatum to General Bor. Apparently unable to defeat the Poles on the field of battle, the Germans tried to do so by intimidation and "surrender or die" threats.

Saturday the 12th was marked by extremely heavy action in the Old City section which the Germans were furiously trying to retake. By Sunday, Polish garrisons in the western part of Warsaw again took the offensive and routed the Germans from several streets, but the German attack on the Old City, farther to the east, continued unabated. The Old City, Zoliborz, the northern suburb, and Stawki, with the Danzig railway station, changed hands incessantly throughout the second week of the struggle. Flames and smoke, some from artillery barrages, some from houses deliberately fired by the Germans, engulfed every part of Warsaw, creating additional obstacles to General Bor's forces.

Apparently forgotten by the rest of the world, General Bor's home army was, however, fully supported by the citizens of the capital who offered supplies, homes, labor and even their lives in the unequal struggle.

CORDELL HULL WARNS GERMAN BARBARIANS

On August 28 the Polish Ambassador, Jan Ciechanowski, issued a statement revealing that in order to take revenge upon the Polish Home Army of Warsaw, and to bring about their surrender and capitulation, the German authorities aim within the next few days to exterminate 150,000 Polish civilians concentrated in a wholesale slaughter camp at Pruszkow, 15 miles southwest of Warsaw; that the Polish Home Army at Warsaw was appealing to the civilized world to do everything possible to prevent the perpetration of this final act of German barbarity, unprecedented in history. Our Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, immediately notified the German Government that those responsible for this atrocity will be fully and completely punished and that the German government will be held responsible for this depraved act of revenge against old men, women, and children.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot let down this heroic and courageous people. We cannot turn a deaf ear to their pleas. The first battle of Warsaw was tragic. The pleas for help from the valiant defenders could not be met by the Allies at that time. The second battle of Warsaw must not be lost. This time the pleas for help must be heard and must be answered. History must not record a second denial.

Farmers and Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial, from the September 1943 issue of Farm Journal and Farmer's Wife:

Farmers, because they plan their lives as well as their days, will readily grasp the basic truth about a nation's foreign policy.

This truth is that foreign policy is shaped out of the centuries and designed to last for centuries. It is made by events and facts, not by temporary men; it is enforced by events and, when necessary, by armed might.

For the foreign policy of our great Nation to be made the subject of charge and countercharge in every fourth year's political campaign would be disastrous misfortune.

As Virginia's venerable patriot, Senator CARTER GLASS, said the other day, politics should stop at the water's edge.

To wrangle over foreign policy in the 1944 campaign, as is currently threatened, would be inexcusable in the midst of a critical war. Mud-throwing on the foreign front could only result in breeding hatred for our allies as well as for our enemies. Such a campaign would necessarily be conducted in ignorance of those essential facts which only the executive inner councils and the State Department possess. It would critically hamper the State Department in dealing with the very great responsibilities now in its care.

The small groups of noisy extremists on either side must not be permitted to turn foreign policy into political capital. This is no time for either the extreme internationalist or the extreme isolationist.

One war abroad is enough, without having the Nation split into rival camps contending over future foreign policy which neither can make, which neither can understand, and for which the time has not yet matured.

The hearts of the American people have, during their history, been devoted to three basic principles of foreign policy. Fundamental has been an attitude of Christian decency, with friendly cooperation toward all nations willing to meet us part way.

For a century and a quarter we have supported the Monroe Doctrine. That was our declaration to Europe that it must keep out of the New World and we would respect the Old. The support of the Monroe Doctrine was equipped with our own power and that of Britain and the British Fleet. Our interests and British interests were of mutual self-advantage in supporting the Monroe Doctrine. We have twice chosen to resort to war to save the British Nation, among other things, in order to safeguard this doctrine. And we have clung to the simple policy of no entangling alliances which George Washington set down for an infant nation to follow.

In time of war, foreign relations must be dictated lagrely by the armed forces in the interest of advancing the victory. In peacetime, we return to long-range policies. Then, our policy will be that determined by the American people, through a two-thirds vote in the Senate for approval of ideas submitted by the then Chief Executive and State Department. It will recognize that we are but 7 percent of the world's people. Foreign policy always recognizes this minority position.

There is much war ahead of us. More than one administration may come and go before our adjustments for a long-range modern peacetime policy can be fully developed.

We shall be wiser and stronger to stand united on the broad basis of extending the hand of Christian fellowship wherever it will be received, always keeping the mailed fist as a protection aaginst the threats of would-be aggressors. And let's beware of the kind of man who is "a steady patriot of the world alone, the friend of every country but his own."

As Abraham Lincoln said, "With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; * * * to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all notions."

A Challenge to the American People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a most timely and excellent article entitled "A Challenge to the American People," written by Mr. Archibald MacLeish, Librarian of Congress, and published in the New York Times of August 13, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A CHALLENGE TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

(By Archibald MacLeish, Librarian of Congress)

THE TIMES DEMAND GREATNESS, SAYS MR. MACLEISH; IT IS NOT WEALTH BUT WHAT WE ARE THAT COUNTS

There are times in the history of any people when greatness is demanded of them; when they will either achieve greatness or lose themselves. This is such a time in the history of the American people. There are decisions of great danger and difficulty to be made. We have a part to play in making them. They will require of us whatever resources of greatness we possess.

Some of our public advisers seem to be telling us that the resources on which we must rely are our resources of power and size and wealth and strength; that in the "real world," as they call it, a great nation is simply a great power; that what is required of us now is to conduct ourselves like a great power in concert with other great powers; that if we do, the new world we want, the new world we must create or perish, will be created of itself.

It is attractive doctrine. It fits in with everything we have been telling ourselves over the last 25 years about our size and our wealth and our productive capacity. If all we need to do to achieve the greatness demanded of us is to be big and powerful and rich and to make reasonable arrangements with other states which are also big and powerful and rich, we have nothing to worry about.

But there is something in our past, something in our tradition, which makes it difficult for us to believe that the quality of greatness in a people is the same as the quality of bigness. We are not at all sure, most of us, that we were a greater nation under McKinley than we were under Jefferson. And we suspect that the same thing may be true of other peoples—of the English, for example. England—and it is no disparagement of a Queen to say so—England was greater in the reign of Elizabeth when she was half an island than in the reign of Victoria when she was half an earth. Between Greece which was small and Persia which was large there was never any question which was the greater.

It is the same of a people's wealth. Most of us have a streak of New England in us somewhere, and New England remembers men and women who achieved their Nation's greatness on a thin, poor soil, in a country of rocks and sand and hemlocks and long winters. They say of a man in Massachusetts, "It isn't what he has to do with it; it's what he is." They would say the same of a nation.

It is not size or power or wealth we think of when we reach back in our minds for the strength we know we need in this moment of decision. Curious as it may seem to the rest of the world—curious as it seems apparently to some of our own compatriots—the American mind and the American tradition mistrust mere size and wealth and power. The qualities we have in mind when we ask ourselves wherein our greatness has consisted in the past, and in what it now consists, are qualities, as New England knows and as the country knows, which lie within a people, not around them. It is not our wealth or power. It is what we are.

We are not the first to ask what the quality of greatness in a nation is. A statesman of Athens once discussed that question in a famous speech. Pericles was a man who had some claim to knowledge of these things, for his name, then as later, was associated with the epoch of the greatest fame of a people whose fame has never been surpassed. He spoke, moreover, in the time of a great war of his people and over the bodies of the first dead in that war.

The reasons given by Pericles in his funeral oration for the greatness of the Athenians are reasons which have a peculiar appropriateness to the questions which now haunt our minds, for not once in the whole of his oration—and it is remarkable that this should be so—not once did Pericles list or describe the possessions of the Athenians, though they had many of great richness and repute, and only once, and as a kind of afterthought, did he speak of the skill of the Athenians in one thing or another, though they were a skillful people. All the rest was an account of the things in which the Athenians believed—the ideas they believed in; the principles they loved and admired—as though he assumed, and as though all his hearers assumed with him, that what makes a nation great is not what it owns, or even what it can do, but what it loves.

"We live under a form of government," said Pericles, "which does not emulate the institutions of our neighbors. On the contrary, we are ourselves a model which some follow rather than imitators of other peoples. * * * Our Government is called a democracy because its administration is in the hands, not of the few but of the many. * * *"

"We are restrained from lawlessness," he said, "chiefly through reverent fear, for we render obedience to those in authority and to the laws and especially to those laws which are ordained for the succor of the oppressed, and those which, though unwritten, bring upon the transgressor a disgrace which all men recognize.

"In our system of training for warfare," he continued, "we place our dependence upon the courage which springs from our own souls when we are called to action * * * a courage which springs more from manner of life than compulsion of laws * * *.

"We are lovers of beauty, yet with no extravagance, and lovers of wisdom, yet without weakness * * *.

"Again in nobility of spirit we stand in sharp contrast to most men. For it is not by receiving kindness but by conferring it that we acquire our friends."

And it was in these words that Pericles concluded this part of his address: "Many are the proofs which we have given of our power, which we have acquired in consequence of these qualities * * *. And assuredly it does not lack witnesses and therefore we shall be the wonder, not only of the men of today, but of after times. We shall need no Homer to sing our praise, nor any other poet * * *."

To Pericles, who had more reason than most to understand the quality of greatness in a people, a great people was a people whose ideas had greatness and who practiced those ideas.

There are many Americans who believe, in the deep tradition of their Nation and their nurture, that what was true of the quality of greatness in Athens is true of the quality of greatness in ourselves; who believe, that is, that the greatness of the American people does not now and never did consist in the size of the United States, or in its wealth of material resources, or in its armed power, but in the people themselves—which is to say, in the attachment of the people to the idea which created them as a people.

In the beginning of the great generation, in the generation of first American greatness, it was the living attachment of the American people to the ideas which they set down by the hand of Thomas Jefferson in the Declaration of their Independence, and the willingness of the American people to fight for those ideas, and their willingness to commit themselves to a government established upon those ideas as a foundation, which made them great.

America had greatness as a nation in those days, small as it was, and weak as it was, and poor as it was, because it was a symbol of human liberty—of the right of all men everywhere to live their lives in dignity and freedom and of the possibility that men could live so.

America had greatness as a Nation in those days because America had meaning as a Nation.

Whenever in its history America has been great, it has been great because it had this meaning and not otherwise.

Because it meant something.

Because it had the only greatness that has ever mattered in the history of nations:

The greatness of the devotion of a people to a great ideal.

The greatness of a great idea become a nation.

Whenever in its history America has been less than great, it has been less than great because it listened to those who said that size and power and wealth came first, and the beliefs came after; that reality came first and the ideas could wait; that wars came first and the purposes of the wars came later; that the making of peace came first and the principles on which the peace was made were for afterward.

We were a symbol in the beginning of our history of the eventual freedom of all mankind. When we cease to be that symbol we shall cease to be this Nation.

H-Hour of D-Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALT HORAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, the whole world searches for an ethic—some field of agreement in which a universal covenant can be drawn up sufficient to maintain the peace of the world. Meanwhile, the letters from the boys at the front indicate that they are growing very, very serious about this whole matter of war.

At this time it is my thought that perhaps some interest might attach to the material being sent to the boys at the front through the chaplaincy of the armed forces. Therefore, I am enclosing an article which is going in large quantities to the boys around the world. It was written by Rev. C. A. Cooper, president of the Pacific Northwest Evangelistic Association. Reverend Cooper is a constituent of mine.

Perhaps we may, after all, find the ethics for world peace in the very keystone of our American morality.

H-HOUR OF D-DAY

On H-hour of D-day, June 6, 1944, America's and the world's hour of destiny struck. Titantic struggles were in the offing. Momentous issues hung trembling in the balance. On that fateful day no better action could have been suited to the need than that of President Roosevelt and King George VI in calling upon their citizenry to seek the Lord's aid, the latter calling for the confession of our own shortcomings. This was timely, since to invoke God's blessing with high-sounding phrases without sincere confession and true abandonment of sins—personal and national—is pure, unadulterated folly.

The time has come for a spiritual offensive on the home front to complement the military offensive on the battle front. Peace cannot be purchased with rivers of blood. Guns alone do not win wars. Might does not make right even when that might is on our side. In the name of Him before whom all nations are as a drop in the bucket, when will we learn that the fortunes of war are in the hands of God and the smile of God is victory? Arguments could be multiplied, no end, to substantiate the fact that total victory in a total war cannot possibly come without total mobilization of such spiritual resources as national repentance, prayer, and righteousness.

In further support of our contention that victory for the United Nations can come only from the Lord who "maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth" (Psalms xlix:9), we have but to cite a few military victories granted at the Lord's discretion in answer to prayer.

"Prayer was the strongest weapon of the marines on Guadalcanal," said Maj. Donald O'Neil. "Do marines pray? They pray unashamedly and often aloud."

Gen. Sir Bernard L. Montgomery in a special message to his valiant Eighth Army before the Battle of Egypt, said, "Let us pray the Lord God Almighty to give us the victory." Later he called upon them to give thanks in these words, "He has done so and I know you will agree with me when I say we must not forget to thank Him for His success."

The prayers of General Gort, dubbed "Britain's praying General," and General Dobbie, a Christian gentleman of long standing, "I have known Christ for 47 years," were the main factors in the heroic defense of Malta. Consequently the most-bombed spot on earth stands today as a witness to God's preservation, in answer to the daily prayer meetings General Dobbie held with his troops.

"IN GOD WE TRUST"

These words first appeared on United States of America coins in 1864, when America was in the throes of the Civil War. People everywhere wondered what the outcome of the terrible struggle would be. The Nation faced disaster. Foes were without and within. The motto was chosen by the Government, at the request of Salmon P. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury, to fittingly express the ideal that "no nation can be strong except in the strength of the Lord." America and all the United Nations need that vanguard today.

In these days of war we must not abandon our trust in God for utter reliance upon exclusive military might. We can, we must, as Oliver Cromwell once advised his troops, "Put our trust in God," as well as keep our powder dry. I was delighted with a statement by a United States Army chaplain in a recent letter. He wrote, "Who knows if we all praise the Lord we might save a lot of that ammunition." God bless America and save her and her allies from degenerating into a materialism which cries "In guns we trust," and help us to see "To whom God will, there will be the victory." Man proposes, but God disposes.

Unless God shall keep our city
All its watchmen wake in vain;
For in God and in Him only,
Peace and safety may we gain.
Unless God shall guard our country
Ne'er securely can it stand;
He alone holds all the nations
In the hollow of His hand.

Restoration of Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER
OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, 5 years ago today Hitler invaded Poland. The inexcusable and brutal attack was made with full knowledge that Great Britain was committed to come to the defense of Poland. What Hitler did not seem to realize was the fact that he was starting down a road that could only lead to suffering and disaster for millions of people.

Today, 5 years later, Hitler must realize that unconditional surrender is his only remaining move. When victory is finally achieved, we will remember Poland's heroic defense. The brave people of Poland held back the Nazi hordes while the United Nations mustered their forces.

In the near future representatives of the nations of the world will sit around the council table to work out a plan to prevent future wars. It is my sincere hope that whoever represents the United States will insist upon the restoration of every foot of Polish territory. As long as I have a voice in the affairs of our Government, that voice will be raised whenever necessary to insure the restoration of a free Poland with her boundaries respected by all.

French Reds Assume Role of Liberators

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN LESINSKI
OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article written by Westbrook Pegler as his column in the papers of August 30, 1944:

FRENCH REDS ASSUME ROLE OF LIBERATORS

(By Westbrook Pegler)

Reporters in France tell of the execution of French women and men who were deemed to have collaborated with the Nazis and of women shorn as a mark of disgrace. The trials must have been informal and emotional, and there runs through the dispatches a strong suggestion that the Communists of France now are sitting as judges of patriotism to a country which they themselves betrayed in the days of the phony war and on down to the fall.

In the New York Herald Tribune, John Chabot Smith, writing from Marseille, says the French Forces of the Interior, after seizing a town, install a local government consisting of the council of liberation, or men named by the council. The council, he says, includes a representative from each of the six principal political groups, including the Communist.

That the Communists in France, as here, fight desperately for communism no man will deny. Like the Nazis, they are political fanatics and as cruel, wanton, devious, and treacherous. They have so much in common that not long ago before the war some American writers who had studied history in process in Germany were calling the Nazis brown Bolsheviks.

But it is a fact, nevertheless, that they were traitors to France and would have opened the gates from the inside to let the Nazis in without a fight, just as the Communists in the United States did all they could to keep this country unarmed and helpless until June 1941.

President Roosevelt, himself, flatly accused the American Communists of this when he sent a regiment of the Regular Army to Inglewood, Calif., to drive their terrorists from the gates of one of our most important airplane factories so that the Americans could get to their jobs. Elmer Davis, of the O. W. I., said that in the absence of more exact information he would regard as a Communist anyone who opposed our rearming program prior to Hitler's attack on Russia but changed overnight when the Berlin-Moscow alliance broke.

To refresh our memory of the conduct of the American Communists during that time we may refer to the files of some of the house organs of the C. I. O. unions which were then and remain today Communist fronts, controlled by clever and indefatigable Communist minorities. The Daily Worker is another reliable reference.

The Communists in France were worse than useless in the French Army facing the Germans. They not only wouldn't fight the Nazis, but they made more ghastly the desperate position of those Frenchmen who did fight and many of whom died. They were saboteurs in the factories and ports and collaborationists in far more deadly and tragic ways while there was still a chance of survival than those who, during the long dark night since the fall, lost hope of rescue and simply submitted.

French politics has been so horribly corrupt and confused that even before the war few Americans had the confidence in their judgment to boast that they understood. But undoubtedly there were Royalists and Fascists of varying degrees who saw the situation as a choice between fascism and communism and, after the collapse, went Fascist or collaborationist.

But there was one certainty during all that time down to the collapse: The French Communists were active, aggressive traitors who stabbed their own country in the back just as surely as Mussolini did, and only after the foul deed was done and the Nazis were in suddenly turned patriots because Russia, their spiritual homeland, was in danger. Their purpose was not to rescue France but to help Russia by harassing the Nazis in France.

That such people should now be able to hound and condemn and execute others, even though some of the accused actually were traitors, is a hideous irony and an injustice to the American and British fighters who drove the Germans out, for these American and British soldiers, too, were betrayed by the Communists and now find French Communists exploiting their victory.

It will not be so apparently, but surely these traitors, too, should be called to trial. Instead we find them participating in the control of the nation they helped the Nazis to humiliate and torture beyond respect of recovery within that term which President Roosevelt calls the foreseeable future.

Asks Pearl Harbor Probe Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

ASKS PEARL HARBOR PROBE NOW

Senator FERGUSON (Republican), of Michigan, disclosed today he will seek an immediate senatorial investigation of the Pearl Harbor tragedy.

FERGUSON'S decision to urge an inquiry, despite the fact that Congress enacted a law postponing court-martial proceedings of Rear Admiral Husband E. Kimmel and Lt. Gen. Walter C. Short, the two former Pearl Harbor commanders, grows out of Kimmel's declaration that the Nation would be amazed by the true story.

WANTS PUBLIC TO JUDGE

"Since they bring out the information that he (Kimmel) is to blame, I think the matter should have the fullest investigation so that the public will have all the facts and judge who is to blame," said FERGUSON.

In refuting statements made by Senator TRUMAN (Democrat), of Missouri, former chairman of the Senate War Investigating Committee and now the Democratic Vice Presidential candidate, Admiral Kimmel contended he has been denied an opportunity to tell his story. Thus, it is assumed he would testify before a congressional body.

Senator O'MAHONEY (Democrat), of Wyoming, member of both the Judiciary and Military Affairs Committees, branded as politics the repeated demands for a court-martial of Kimmel and Short, while Senator BREWSTER (Republican), of Maine, backed the demand for full information on the Pearl Harbor incident without delay.

BREWSTER'S CONTENTION

BREWSTER said the whole treatment of the situation has been such as to make Kimmel and Short "the goats" without their ever having an opportunity to defend themselves, which is most un-American.

"I have never been satisfied with the argument that it would hinder the war if we have all the facts known," BREWSTER added. "I think Congress has leaned over backward in not going into the matter."

BREWSTER added tartly that one could hardly expect a commission created by the Executive—the Roberts commission—to convict the Executive who created it.

Synagogue of Rome Broadcast

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. HART

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, in the extension of my remarks I am pleased to include the first Jewish broadcast from Nazi liberated territory. The broadcast was under the auspices of the American-Jewish committee and was heard over the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co. on Sunday, July 23, 1944. It follows:

ANNOUNCER. The National Broadcasting Co. in cooperation with the American Jewish Committee brings you now a special broadcast of historic significance, with the first Jewish broadcast from Nazi-occupied territory liberated by the Allies. The program will originate in this Synagogue of Rome, which was reopened only last month.

The reopening of the Synagogue of Rome symbolizes the triumph of all religion over nazi-ism, the liberation of peoples of all religions and creeds. The synagogue service will be under the direction of the chief rabbi of Italy, Rabbi Israel Zolli.

CANTOR AND CHOIR. Selection: Yo-Fu-Tzu O-Y'Vecho—Thine Enemy Be Dispersed.

RABBI ISRAEL ZOLLI. From the moral and religious point of view the life of a man or of a nation has only the value of the ideals that have inspired their life and their deeds. The brave American soldiers, like the armies of the Allied Nations, are the expression, I daresay the incarnation in our minds of the ideal of liberty and justice, for us who are a part of the European Jews who have suffered and who, in those countries that have not yet been freed, still suffer unutterably for the same ideal. You fight heroically and victoriously for the ideal of which we are the martyrs. It is for the sake of this ideal that joins us together that I bless you and all the Allied armies, the generous United Nations and their leaders and their governments, from the bottom of my heart. I bless the noble Italian people and its Government, the Jews that are fighting in the Allied ranks, his ancient community, the Jews of Italy and of the whole world. Amen.

I now have the honor and the privilege to introduce Chaplain Aaaron Paperman, Jewish chaplain of the Fifth Army.

Chaplain AARON PAPERMAN. It is indeed symbolic for the Jewish people that this traditional period of 9 days of mourning over the ancient destruction of the temple in Jerusalem by the Roman legions of Titus, should be transformed almost 1,900 years later into a period of joy, celebration, and thanksgiving for the Jews of Rome at their deliverance from their Nazi and Fascist tyrants and oppressors. Yes, centuries ago pagan Rome tolled the apparent death knell of the Jewish people. Today its children in the first capital of Europe to be liberated, found the time and the hope and the courage for the survival of the Jewish people.

It is most fitting that the happy celebration of the liberation of the Jews of Rome should be manifested in these religious services of thanksgiving to God. For the godliness in man played as decisive a role in the preservation of their lives as the armed might of the Fifth Army played in their liberation. If it had not been for the very large and substantial succor and aid extended to them by the Vatican and church authorities in Rome, these hundreds of refugees and these thousands of Jewish inhabitants would undoubtedly have perished long before Rome was liberated. May God grant the preservation of our remaining brethren in the still enslaved countries of Europe, that they, too, may rejoice with their compatriots of all faiths at their liberation from Nazi oppression by the United Nations. Amen!

I now bring you a message from Lt. Gen. Mark W. Clark, commanding general of the Fifth Army. These are General Clark's words. I quote:

"This is a proud day for the Fifth Army, for the Jewish people and for the free world. For us who are fighting this bitter struggle, today's services represent the fruit of what we are fighting for, the promise of what the United Nations will bring to a liberated world."

ANNOUNCER. Ladies and gentlemen, you have just heard a special broadcast presented by the National Broadcasting Co. in cooperation with the American Jewish Committee marking the first Jewish broadcast from Nazi liberated territory. The program originated in the Synagogue of Rome and celebrated the triumph of all religious forces over nazi-ism. Participants in the program were Rabbi Israel Zolli, chief rabbi of Italy, and Chaplain Aaron Paperman, of the United States Army.

Hon. James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW J. MERRITT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article, which appeared in the Syracuse (N. Y.) Herald recently, titled "'Big Jim' Farley Out as State Chairman":

"BIG JIM" FARLEY OUT AS STATE CHAIRMAN

The testimonial dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York, attended by 1,500 people, marks the passing of James A. "Big Jim" Farley as chairman of the Democratic State committee.

Of Mr. Farley it can be said that he is a straight shooter who doesn't play a double game in politics, business, or personal relationships. When he reached a point where he could not go along with his party, except by adopting a hypocritical and insincere attitude of agreement with principles which in his heart he repudiated, he resigned, though anyone who knows his love of the political game must realize that this decision was not reached without regret. But that's the way "Big Jim" plays ball. Whatever the immediate prospects may be, one doubts that he is out of the political picture permanently.

Senator George A. Norris

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, knowing that Senator Norris' friends in the Nation's Capital are concerned over his present illness, I am passing on for information of the House a telegram received this afternoon from the Senator's home town. I hope that he will soon be on the road to recovery. The telegram is as follows:

McCOOK, NEBR., September 1, 1944.

Congressman CARL T. CURTIS,

Washington, D. C.:

Not much change in Senator Norris' condition this morning. Still in semiconscious state.

CARL F. MARSH.

Truman Versus Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Frank C. Waldrop, from the Washington Times-Herald:

TRUMAN VERSUS TRUMAN

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

The debate between HARRY S. TRUMAN, chairman of the Senate committee investigating the war production program, and HARRY S. TRUMAN, second half of the term IV midstream horse, if any, is now beginning to get under way. It will get hotter.

For it so happens that back in the days when he never dreamed Vice Presidential lightning would strike him, HARRY S. TRUMAN, the senatorial investigator, was a considerable personal critic of F. D. R.'s ability as a war maker on the industrial front.

Latest disclosure along this line came yesterday in the matter of the article Senator TRUMAN, with the aid of a ghost, did for American Magazine in November 1942. The key line of that piece, which TRUMAN signed and then tried to keep out of circulation was:

"We owe it to ourselves to insist that the President act promptly to halt the selfish fights for power, the endless bickerings, and dissension which have so far blocked the complete utilization of our productive energies."

Just why the Senator tried to strangle that after he had approved it for publication is unclear, for he had said as much before and has said as much since.

For example, on August 14, 1941, TRUMAN, the senatorial investigator, was ripping up the administration's handling of war production when Senator VANDENBERG of Michigan (see pages 7117-18 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 87, pt. 7), asked:

"Mr. VANDENBERG. In other words, the Senator is now saying that the chief bottleneck which the defense program confronts is the lack of adequate organization and coordination in the administration of defense?

"Mr. TRUMAN. That is exactly what the hearings before our committee will prove.

"Mr. VANDENBERG. Who is responsible for that situation?

"Mr. TRUMAN. There is only one place where the responsibility can be put.

"Mr. VANDENBERG. Where is that—the White House?

"Mr. TRUMAN. Yes, sir.

"Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator. [Laughter.]

"Mr. TRUMAN. I have been very happy to note that a number of the Members of Congress have recently seen the seriousness of this matter, which I have been pointing out for many months."

"I noticed the other day a quotation from the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the effect that the priorities situation is going to be worse than anything Mr. Hitler could do to us.

"Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, my observation at this moment in my own section of the country—if the Senator will permit me to say it—is that the summary and precipitate and arbitrary fashion in which priorities and curtailments are being administered is calculated to do infinitely more damage to the United States in the next 6 months than any external enemy possibly could do.

"Mr. TRUMAN. That is the present view of the committee."

Again, early this year, the Truman committee took another rap at Roosevelt in its annual report to the whole Senate on war production for 1943:

"From its inception, this committee has insisted repeatedly on the need for clear-cut authority centered in a single executive, rather than multiheaded agencies, to administer the war program.

"The delay of 18 months in establishing such an administrative set-up was responsible for many weaknesses and failures criticized by the committee in the early months of the war effort."

Incidentally, the $750 he got for the article in American Magazine is not the only sum Senator TRUMAN has received for his comments on the war production program.

He has been paid, he said yesterday, a total of $1,200 for three speeches that parallel, on the whole, his usual line that the war could be run better. The money for these, he said, he has deposited to his own personal credit. The $750 he handled in another way.

It seems the committee has been operating two bank accounts at the Hamilton National Bank, here, "HARRY S. TRUMAN Account No. 1" and "HARRY S. TRUMAN Account No. 2."

Account No. 1 is for official funds granted out of the United States Government's tax revenues by Congress and spent only on objects authorized in the resolution establishing the investigating committee. These would include such items as clerk and counsel hire, travel expenses for members, stationery, and recording expenses.

Account No. 2 is something novel in the congressional line. Into that, according to Mrs. Peggy Buchholtz, clerk of the committee, the $750 went to pay for "committee expenses not on the official list," as for instance, extra copies of reports over and above the number officially published by the Government Printing Office for the committee's use.

Senator TRUMAN, who said he didn't really know much about it all, disclosed that his committee has received several gifts of money, all of which have been deposited in Account No. 2. Just who gave these, he couldn't recall yesterday nor did he remember the total deposits and expenditures through this account, but promised he would look them up and report in a few days.

When he does, details will be reported herein.

Federal Aid to Highway Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a resolution passed by the chamber of commerce of my home city of Greenville, S. C., pointing out the great need for immediate action on the part of the Congress on the Federal aid to public-highway legislation.

Needless to say, I fully concur in the views expressed in the resolution and again call upon the Committee on Roads to press for final action on this important legislation before any other recesses are taken.

Whereas the highways of our Nation, and the passenger cars, trucks and busses that use them are necessary to the economic and sound development of our rural and urban life; and

Whereas our rural highways have never been developed to such a point that the maximum safety and lowest cost of operation are afforded highway transportation users; and

Whereas the development of our highways by the States in conjunction with the Federal Government was stopped after our entry into this war, with the exception of those projects necessary to the war effort, thereby placing on highway wartime loads under conditions that were such that proper maintenance has been impossible; and

Whereas such wartime conditions have caused a rapid deterioration of our highways, many of which require replacement or reconstruction; and

Whereas highway construction and increased highway transportation resulting therefrom create a maximum of high level employment so necessary in the post-war period of adjustment for men returning from our armed forces, as well as civilians now engaged in war work, thereby eliminating the need for setting up public works projects of an artificial nature; and

Whereas public works Federal-aid highway legislation has been introduced in both branches of Congress (bills S. 205 in the Senate and H. R. 4915 in the House of Representatives), indicating that the Congress recognizes the need for a highway program, and that such a program will create useful jobs for returning servicemen; and

Whereas the highway departments of the several States cannot properly proceed with our post-war highway plans until such a time that post-war Federal-aid highway legislation has been enacted by the Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved by the highway committee of the Greenville Chamber of Commerce on August 28, 1944, That this organization recognizes the need for immediate action on the part of the Congress and urges immediate consideration of pending post-war Federal highway legislation by both branches to the end that this legislation will be voted upon favorably before the next recess of the Congress.

Resolved, Copies of this resolution be furnished the Senators and Congressmen of South Carolina urging their influence in having this legislation voted upon favorably during this session of Congress.

Executive Vice President.

Chairman, Highway Committee.

Make Way for Tomorrow

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, we are giving much thought these days to the physically handicapped citizens of the United States. There is a Labor Committee subcommittee, headed by Representative AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, now conducting hearings on this subject. I am pleased to serve on this group, which to use Mr. Kelley's words—must first determine how many physically handicapped persons there are in the United States, and where they are located. We must determine the best way to group and classify the types of physical handicaps. We must find out what facilities are available to aid all groups of physically handicapped. We must learn the causes of the handicaps and the means to cure or alleviate them. We must know what is the best way to train and educate each type of physically handicapped person. And, if possible, we must determine on an over-all program for assistance to this enormous segment of our population.

A radio talk by Fraser S. Gardner, national employment officer of Disabled American Veterans, has recently been called to my attention. I believe its contents form a contribution to the subject of what we can and should do to assist physically handicapped. The address follows:

There isn't a better recruit to be found right now to man the machines of the Nation's war plants than the man who has been wounded in battle and been discharged as unfit for further duty.

Right up there with these veterans, as topnotch production workers, are many men who have been discharged from service for disabilities incurred in some other fashion than at the fighting front.

There are many jobs in which these physically handicapped persons are doing especially good work—and some in which they even excel the able-bodied. Recent studies of the utilization of handicapped workers show that placements of such workers in 1943 were approximately seven times the number placed in 1940. During 1940, a period when production was stepped up to meet the needs of the Allied Nations for war materials, only 27,703 placements of handicapped persons were made. In 1941, the number placed rose to 53,224. During 1942, following Pearl Harbor, the total went up to 91,410, and at the end of 1943, records showed 194,239 handicapped persons had been placed last year, many of whom were disabled veterans.

The fact that thousands of servicemen will come back from this war placed in the category of "disabled" cannot be ignored, and the foregoing figures give us reason to believe that industries' current attitude toward handicapped workers will continue in the post-war period. Blind workers with proper training are satisfactorily employed in a wide variety of positions. They are especially proficient in manual occupations requiring a delicate sense of touch. They are well suited to jobs which are repetitious in nature, such as packing cartridges, inserting kapok into life-belt pads, and various types of sorting. They perform these jobs faster and more accurately than those who rely on sight.

Workers with limited or no hearing are preferred by many employers for noisy jobs. Examples: Boilermaker, welder, riveter, chipper, press operator, and office-machine operator. Many are good at clerical duties. Others have corrected their loss of hearing with modern hearing aids and are no more conscious of the fact that they are using an aid than they would be if they were wearing glasses.

Persons with disabilities of one or both upper extremities, especially when wearing modern artificial appliances, work efficiently as welders, as spray painters, and in many other jobs in production departments. Others are profitably used as inspectors, storekeepers, clerical workers, etc.

Workers with deformities of the spine are successfully employed in a wide variety of work in which no heavy lifting is required.

Persons with arrested tuberculosis are suitably employed in any number of positions calling for light, moderate, and semiarduous duties, provided the environment is favorable (absence of fumes, dusts, extreme temperature changes).

Organic heart cases, fully compensated, frequently excel in positions involving desk or bench duty, in machine-shop positions, and in drafting positions.

Many persons with handicaps are doing outstanding work in technical, scientific, and professional positions. At all occupational levels, handicapped workers are engaged in jobs vital to the war program.

All of these men are putting a real effort into production in any war plant that hires them. They have a desire for work that is catching. They know what war is; they know how badly production is needed. They pass their enthusiasm on to other workers. They give a lift to the morale of all workers.

It is interesting to learn that the Army and Navy E production award has been awarded to the employees of G. Barr & Co., of Chicago, Ill. Ninety-five percent of all the employees of this company are people with severe physical disabilities, all of whom have thoroughly demonstrated, as the presentation of this award indicates, that, when disabled veterans and other handicapped people are selectively placed in jobs they can handle, they can do as much work and as good work, or better, than people who have no disabilities. Disabled veterans have participated in Army and Navy E production awards as working men in other plants, but this is the first time an E award has been granted to a firm whose whole office and factory personnel, with very few exceptions, are handicapped people.

The procedure in placing these men in jobs best suited to their skills and abilities is not much different than that which is generally followed in present-day employment. Of course it can be done more expertly if completely and adequately staffed employment and medical departments are available. (Some additional special training may be wise for those individuals handling such cases.)

A complete physical examination will augment and assist the employment experts in selecting the best type of work. It may be necessary to transfer these men several times before the right niche is found. Following the examination and placement of the disability cases, recommendation can be made by the examining physician for certain continuing medical treatments as in cases of nutritional deficiencies and tropical disease infections.

All efforts should be directed to reestablishing these men in a gainful occupation so that they may "carry their own weight." In some instances they will not be able to earn a full wage. Disabled veterans sometimes find job placement difficult because of insurance risks and accident compensation costs.

Not all employers carry Workmen's Compensation Insurance. These employers should consult their insurance companies as to workman's compensation insurance or insurance employment policies. It is highly important that all employers, insured, self-insured, or noninsured, be informed of the facts and figures pertaining to employment of the physically handicapped. Such considerable uncollated information as is available, points to the physically handicapped as a source of untapped manpower, revealing that under suitable conditions such persons can serve effectively without becoming hazards to themselves or others, they expect no favors and produce as well or better than the average of normal people—having suffered once, they are exerting every effort and precaution, not to suffer again.

It is interesting to note, K. Vernon Banta, Specialist in Services to Physically Handicapped, United States Employment Service, has said: "That a survey was recently made in a large manufacturing plant, in which some 685 handicapped employees were compared with the same number of able-bodied workers, and 5.6 percent fewer accidents were found to occur among the handicapped workers."

It is obvious that to obtain full utilization of an employees' capacity, disabled or not disabled, he must be placed in a position for which his capabilities fit him and that in justice to employer and employee alike, special thought should be given to his placement. The very great majority of people who may be termed "disabled" are disabled only to the extent of being incapable of performing some functions, while remaining or capable of becoming skilled in many kinds of employment. Thus, the disabled veteran worker will find his employers emphasizing his capabilities rather than his disabilities.

The problem boils right down to finding the kind of work these handicapped people can do—training them to do it. The variety of jobs for which they are suited—and which they are already handling with unusual capacity—is truly amazing.

The Pearl Harbor Disaster

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Mount Vernon (Ohio) News:

A CHALLENGE

The story of the Pearl Harbor disaster which plunged the United States into the war has never been told in full.

But it should be—and before the Presidential election.

The American people are being asked to elect President Roosevelt to a fourth term on the theory that it would be a mistake to change the Commander in Chief while the war is in progress.

At the same time the American people are not being given an opportunity to judge the capabilities of the Commander in Chief because of the suppression of facts on one of the most disastrous defeats in the Nation's history.

The excuse was made, during the early days of the war, that national security made it inadvisable to tell the full story of the Pearl Harbor tragedy. That was true at the time but it is no longer true.

The damage wrought by Jap bombs at Pearl Harbor was repaired—long ago. Germany is on the verge of defeat. There is no longer question about the outcome of the war in the Pacific.

Revelation of the last detail of the Pearl Harbor matter, including the fixing of the responsibility for the failure of American defenses to properly function, could no longer be of military value to the enemy.

There is no longer reason to hold anything back, unless the reasons are political.

And the suspicions that political pressure has entered strongly into the secrecy that has surrounded our first battle of World War No. 2 grows stronger every day.

Court-martial trials of Admiral Husband E. Kimmel, military commander, and Lt. Gen. Walter C. Short, Army commander in Hawaii at the time the Japs struck, have been delayed with the generally understood intention of not holding them until after the war is over.

The delay is in spite of the fact the two men, held responsible in the report on the Roberts investigation, have repeatedly said they are ready to answer the charges.

Admiral Kimmel only recently branded as false statements regarding lack of Army-Navy cooperation at Pearl Harbor, made in a magazine article by Senator TRUMAN, Democratic nominee for Vice President.

And Representative WARREN G. MAGNUSON, Washington Democrat, recently called public attention to stories that are going the rounds, to the effect that the Japanese envoy tricked American officials into bottling up the United States Fleet in Pearl Harbor and withdrawing air patrols in that area, thus setting up a situation which made possible the Japanese surprise attack.

Representative MAGNUSON declared that these rumors say that Admiral Kimmel had received orders from Washington to draw in the Fleet, curtail air activities, and do everything possible to dispel the notion that America was about to attack Japan, in answer to the envoy's complaint that United States military maneuvers were blocking his peace efforts.

"I do not know whether this story is true or false, and I don't venture to speak for or against it," Representative MAGNUSON said, "but I do think the charge should be answered promptly in Washington."

And it should. Reports such as these reflect on the Commander in Chief, particularly as in recent months he has based his plea for reelection on the fact that he holds that office.

As matters now stand, only one side of the case has been told.

Admiral Kimmel and General Short were held responsible for the disaster, and were relieved of their commands.

But they have never been brought to trial, and won't under present arrangements until after the war.

They have been given no opportunity to defend themselves. They cannot, as Army officers, speak out until called before a court martial.

Thus the people of the country have not the facts upon which to pass judgment as to whether these two men are guilty or whether the fault lies higher up, as has been charged in some sources and as the stories being circulated would indicate.

The public is not being given an opportunity to pass judgment on the capabilities of the Commander in Chief who is asking retention in office for a fourth 4-year term.

The requests of the accused Army and Navy commanders for immediate court martial, with the expressed confidence in their ability to vindicate themselves, and the rumors which place responsibility for Pearl Harbor in Washington, constitute a challenge which the administration cannot very well ignore.

Only the administration can clear up the Pearl Harbor mess by ordering immediate court martial for Kimmel and Short.

Only the administration can release the facts which will enable the public to determine whether the Commander in Chief is worthy of retention in office.

Fifth Anniversary of the German Invasion of Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. B. J. MONKIEWICZ

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. MONKIEWICZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a statement released by the Polish-American Congress relative to the fifth anniversary of the German invasion of Poland, and also a letter addressed to the editor of the New York Times.

STATEMENT OF POLISH-AMERICAN CONGRESS

Five years ago, on September 1, cloudless skies rained steel, devastation, and death upon Poland when the Nazis unleashed their hordes for conquest. Though unprepared for the attack, Poland resisted valiantly, with only 31 divisions against 70, 1 armored division against 15, and 443 planes against 4,320. That was all that Poland had mustered because she, on the advice of Great Britain and France, had delayed her mobilization, so as not to give Germany any possible excuse for the attack which came regardless.

Though disarmed within a month, terrorized and subjected to unbelievable and fiendish tortures, Poland fought on, the only occupied country without a Quisling. For 5 long years, within the borders of their motherland, the Poles have been waging a desperate and relentless struggle, engaging in pitched battles, sabotage and destruction of enemy war material, railroads, and military concentrations. Their secret courts have passed sentence and the underground fighters have sent hundreds of Nazi leaders to death. They have paid a terrible price for this activity during the 5 years of bondage. Hundreds of thousands of hostages were hung or shot and hundreds of villages and hamlets have met the fate of Lidice by being burned and plowed under in reprisal. The Polish underground army of 200,000 fully organized and disciplined fighters, has kept over 500,000 Nazi soldiers immobilized and about 60,000 Gestapo agents busy.

Outside Poland, in France and Italy, the Poles fight on as an organized and potential military force. In the invasion to liberate France, 2 armored divisions are now fighting alongside the Canadians and the British. In the campaign in Italy 70,000 Poles, attached to the British Eighth Army, under the command of their own General Anders, are making great progress along the Adriatic shore, after covering themselves with glory at Cassino. The Polish Navy is also making history, in taking part in invasions and sea patrolling and in effective work against submarines and even battleships of the enemy. More than 12,000 fliers make up the heroic Polish Air Force, which so ably proved itself in the Battle of Britain and is continuing its great exploits over Germany and in the sky lanes over the battle fronts in France and Italy.

The fifth anniversary of the German unprovoked attack on Poland, will be marked by Poles everywhere, starting on September 1, at mass meetings and in church services. Here in the United States, in every city and town where Americans of Polish ancestry are grouped, this sad anniversary will also be commemorated in like manner with appropriate programs sponsored by civic leaders, the Polish clergy, and Polish organizations.

[From the New York Times]

POLAND'S POSITION ANALYZED—SETTLEMENT, IT IS CONTENDED, SHOULD BE AFFAIR OF UNITED NATIONS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

It is paradoxical that Rumania is now in a better international position than Poland, even though Poland has, from the very beginning, been the most faithful ally and Rumania the most loyal to Adolph Hitler. King Michael, who collaborated with the Nazis and the Iron Guards, is better off than the democratic Prime Minister Mikolajczyk of Poland.

It is not commonly known that bitterness and anxiety are spreading among the Poles. I have just received a letter from one of my Polish-American friends in Italy about the Polish Army. He writes: "The Polish soldiers' newspapers are full of bitterness and anxiety. I agree that our situation is difficult, but there are situations where reason should overcome emotion, and common sense should be obviously necessary for justice." But the Poles recognize that they are losing the independence for which they have been fighting, and therefore emotions, understandably, run high.

There are many false rumors about the anti-Russian Poles. Most of the Poles recognize the necessity for close cooperation and friendship with the Soviet Union, because they know that they cannot alter natural geography, and that the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia are their natural friends.

In order to bring about this friendship it is essential that the United Nations do not consider the Polish-Soviet settlement as a Polish-Soviet affair only; but, for reasons of collective security, regard it as an international one. However, the United Nations are washing their hands of the matter, and it remains a unilateral—at best a bilateral—instead of a United Nations settlement. The apathy of the United Nations in Polish-Soviet affairs again shows their weakness in dealing with serious international problems. The ideal of the United Nations is losing its prestige, as the ideal of the League did, because they have not been able to solve these problems.

A settlement established by the United Nations will be accepted and respected as a just one, but a settlement reached on a bilateral basis can easily be regarded by the losing side as an imposed decision. For the sake of future peace in central and eastern Europe, therefore, it is most urgent that a special United Nations commission be created to solve the dispute.

FELIKS GROSS,
Editor, New Europe.

Beneath the British Chestnut Tree

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Fort Wayne News-Sentinel of August 30, 1944:

BENEATH THE BRITISH CHESTNUT TREE

Speaking of the Guam issue—Maj. George Fielding Eliot, internationalist and pro-New Deal "military expert," writing in the New Republic for February 1, 1939, had this to say:

"The position of Guam itself, so far west of our main base at Hawaii, is seriously exposed."

He pointed out that "the islands of the Japanese 'mandated area' surround Guam, and aircraft and submarines operating from them would hamper our approach from the east."

In that same article Eliot warned that the time necessary to put Guam in a state of defense would be "a period of danger," declaring that "mere commencement of fortifications might precipitate war."

The decision as to whether or not to take that risk, he insisted, was "bound up with the broader question of what our policy in the Far East is going to be." In which, of course, Eliot was saying exactly what the Hepburn board had said in its report to Congress a few weeks before.

It should be borne in mind that the United States had given the Philippines their independence, to be effective in 1946, and it was to be taken for granted after that time there would be a cessation of American responsibility for their defense.

The report of a policy committee, adopted February 9, 1939, by the Republican conference of the House of Representatives, made that assumption in stating that "we are withdrawing from the Philippines and shall not be expected to defend them."

And newspaper dispatches from Washington in that same month reported that "while naval officials say that strengthening of Guam would simplify defense of Hawaii, they concede that it is not essential for that purpose."

In a paper prepared for Editorial Research Reports on February 16, 1939, Buel W. Patch, one of the most competent of the veteran Washington observers, declared:

"Apart from simplifying defense of Hawaii, the only other reasons mentioned for maintaining a strong position at Guam, in the event of our complete withdrawal from the Philippines, have been defense of the 'Open Door' in China and defense of the trade routes to sources of rubber in the East Indies."

There you have it! Minority commercial interests in China and alien proprietorship over a rubber monopoly on which we were to be kept dependent as long as possible, and by whatever means might prove necessary or feasible?

The British and Dutch controlled the natural-rubber racket, which took its richest prizes from American motorists. And they quite naturally wanted to hang on to that racket and discourage Americans from producing their own rubber from their own alcohol distilled from their own grain.

Moreover, the British, with many, many times as large an investment in China as Americans had, were playing for American aid in protecting their Chinese holdings; although they knew that American investments in Japan were enormously larger than American investments in China, and much larger, also, than British investments in Japan.

So, of course, they wanted us to extend our stakes in the Western Pacific—in Guam or anywhere else in that neck of the woods.

Pin Point of Battle and Debate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be no question aside from the war itself that creates as much discussion and about which there has been so much misinformation handed out by those high in authority, as the vote on the supposed bill to fortify Guam. Of course, every Member of the House, including the Speaker himself, knows no such proposal has been before either the House or the Senate.

Newspapers throughout the country have dealt with this question editorially, and it is amazing how many of the editorial writers have assumed to be true this propaganda based upon nothing other than utter falsehoods.

Among the newspapers which have discussed this question with clarity and veracity is the editor of the Shreveport Times, of Shreveport, La. In his fine editorial he has clearly set forth the facts as they are and not as they are supposed to be by many misinformed people. This paper is published in the deep South and the editor is to be commended for his contribution to a better understanding of this important question.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include the editorial with my remarks:

PIN POINT OF BATTLE AND DEBATE

The island of Guam, pin point in the Pacific, is the scene of raging battle in the Pacific war and bids fair to become the subject of considerable debate in the coming political campaigns. It is to be hoped that reports of American successes on Guam are more founded on fact (and of course they are) than is most of the Guam debate which has been going on at home for many years.

The favorite charge of factional political pulpiteers since the start of the war is that so and so or such and such a group blocked the plans to fortify Guam, or voted against fortification of Guam, or kept the President from fortifying Guam, or what not.

Exactly 100 percent of all such talk is plain unadulterated bunk.

No one ever voted against fortification of Guam or for fortification of Guam because no bill in Congress ever has come up calling for fortification of Guam.

No one ever "kept the President" from fortifying Guam because President Roosevelt never in his life has proposed fortifying Guam. On the contrary, 6 years ago he pigeon-holed the report of his own Navy board which urged fortification of Guam.

And, beyond all of this, all Navy and military men agree that no matter how strongly Guam had been at the start of this war it would have been helpless before the Japs without the full support of Hawaii, Wake, and the Philippines, and Hawaii and the Philippines were immobilized in the first blows of the Jap attack, while Wake was unfortified to any extent and fell quickly.

For the sake of our Nation and its posterity, it would be well if political office seekers would quit playing political pushball with American history in the matter of Guam. What happened about Guam is this:

Guam was acquired by the United States in 1898, under the treaty with Spain. Following World War No. 1, when all civilized nations of the world joined in disarmament, the United States agreed not to fortify Guam, in return for Japan's agreement not to fortify the Marianas, including Saipan, of course.

In the early 1930's the administrations and ruling influences, which were to be effective when World War No. 2 came, went into power in Japan, in the United States, and in Germany. Hitler immediately began building his war machine; shortly afterward the Japanese military clique began its preparations for war against the United States. This Nation let even its defenses disintegrate. Just when Japan began fortifying the Marianas and other Pacific islands in violation of her treaties is not known specifically, but records indicate it was fully known to the United States Government by the time the Roosevelt administration began its second term, for President Roosevelt himself showed some slight interest in the matter then. It was then also that Japan canceled various treaties with this Nation, including the Disarmament Treaty.

In the middle of his second term—the late 1930's—President Roosevelt, acting on the insistence of various Navy admirals and officials and on previous recommendations of General MacArthur when he was Chief of Staff, appointed a naval board headed by Admiral Hepburn to look into Guam. The Hepburn Board made its report in 1938. It recommended full fortification of Guam at a cost of $155,000,000, the island thus to be made into a major air and submarine outpost. The fortification of Guam was to fit in with MacArthur's recommendations for a 6-year program of fortifying the Philippines. Later, almost as war actually descended MacArthur was given some dribbles of support for his fortification plans, but when war came, his official reports show, there was "no more than one or two of any modern weapon" in the Philippines. Guam was unfortified, defenseless.

The Hepburn board report of 1938 apparently made no impression on anyone—from the White House to the Capitol. The President made no recommendation to Congress on it, did not send it to Congress, made no public comment of any kind. Figuratively he put it in a pigeonhole and presumably it still is there, gathering dust.

In 1939 the Navy appropriation bill included a modest item of $5,000,000 for harbor improvements at Guam. Many of those favoring full fortification of Guam voted against this ridiculously tiny item on the ground that a mere $5,000,000 worth of straightening around of some docks, some dredging, et cetera, had nothing to do with defense and would only provoke Japan. In 1940, a similar item, but only $1,000,000 this time, was in the original Navy bill and was stricken by the House. No one in his right mind would contend that either or both of these items would have enabled Guam to hold out so much as one extra minute when war came. The House membership which removed the items was two-thirds Democratic. In 1941, the first appropriation steps toward fortification of Guam were taken—but it was too late.

The story of Guam, so far as fortifying is concerned, is simply a paragraph in the general story of little or no effort to built real defense for this Nation throughout the decade when both Hitler and Japan obviously were building war machines for aggression, especially in the final years when war for the United States itself became little less than an absolute certainty.

The People Want the Truth About Pearl Harbor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED NORMAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. NORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD today a resolution adopted by the Young Men's Republican Club, of King County, Wash., with reference to the attack on Pearl Harbor which started our war with Japan.

I call particular attention to the final paragraph of this resolution, in which this alert organization declares "that the public should be given the facts immediately regarding the Pearl Harbor tragedy, either through an unhampered and full congressional inquiry or through the official court martial proceedings itself."

This resolution, Mr. Speaker, also calls attention to Senator TRUMAN'S assertion that confidential records substantiate his recent charges in a magazine article against Admiral Kimmel and General Short. It also points out that Senator CHANDLER "says he has also seen the complete confidential file in the case and that there is absolutely nothing to justify court-martial proceedings."

The resolution declares that Admiral Kimmel and General Short are "being made the scapegoats for the Pearl Harbor tragedy to protect the New Deal administration."

Now, Mr. Speaker, this resolution embraces some very serious charges; it very clearly points up a national question upon which the merciless light of complete and public investigation should be thrown without further stalling or delay. I am heartily in support of the objectives of this resolution, and I sincerely hope that the people of America are given the true and entire story of Pearl Harbor before it is lost entirely in the smoke screens which have been thrown up around it ever since the first bomb fell on Hawaii. The people want the truth about Pearl Harbor, and it is high time they had it.

The resolution follows:

Whereas the proposed court-martial trial of Admiral Kimmel and General Short for neglect of duty at Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941, has been inexcusably delayed for over 2½ years; and

Whereas the Democratic candidate for Vice President has seen fit to make charges against Admiral Kimmel and General Short in a recent magazine article, which charges he claims are substantiated by the confidential Government record; and

Whereas Senator CHANDLER says he has also seen the complete confidential file in the case and that there is absolutely nothing to justify court-martial proceedings; and

Whereas it seems that Admiral Kimmel and General Short are being made the scapegoats for the Pearl Harbor tragedy to protect the New Deal administration; and

Whereas there appears to be no valid reason why the whole truth should not now be told since military secrecy no longer appears involved and since said officers in common decency should be given an immediate hearing and opportunity to defend themselves: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Young Men's Republican Club of King County, That the public should be given the facts immediately regarding the Pearl Harbor tragedy, either through an unhampered and full congressional inquiry or through the official court-martial proceedings itself; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Congressmen from this State.

Signed at Seattle, Wash., this 28th day of August 1944.

A Letter to Rural Editor Stating My Views on International Cooperation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAMILTON FISH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following letter which expresses my views and sentiments on the vital issue of maintaining and preserving world peace through international cooperation.

The letter follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 30, 1944.

To the Editors of the Walton Reporter,
Walton, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: It is very seldom that I answer editorials in the papers of my congressional district, or anywhere else, but I feel, out of fairness to myself and my friends and supporters, that I should answer your editorial in a recent issue, entitled "Shall It Happen Again?" You were kind, in this editorial, in referring to my visit to the fair and the favorable impressions that I made in meeting with the people there. I am quite sure that you did not deliberately intend to do me an injustice or to misrepresent my views on international cooperation to preserve a just and lasting peace.

It is quite true that I was opposed, together with more than 80 percent of the American people, to having America become involved in foreign wars until we were attacked in such a dastardly way at Pearl Harbor. I voted for all appropriations to maintain and build up the Army and the Navy, as well as the Air Force, but opposed measures, along with 90 percent of the members of my party in the Congress, that would tend to involve the United States in war.

It might interest your readers to know that as far back as January 30, 1939, I introduced a bill in Congress which would prohibit the sale and shipment of scrap iron to Japan, which measure was opposed by the administration. Since that date, and up to the time of Pearl Harbor, over 8,000,000 tons of American scrap iron was shipped to Japan, and it was this scrap iron, turned into Japanese bombs, which poured out of the skies on December 7, 1941, that destroyed our warships and killed 3,000 American soldiers and sailors. I certainly did everything in my power to keep this country out of war; there is no blood upon my hands or upon my conscience for the life of a single American. I refuse to remain silent when you state in your paper: "In times like this a firm handshake and a pleasing smile mean little when compared with the lives of our children and grandchildren." I do not know how many children you have in the war or how many wars you served in, but I served in one war; was decorated for gallantry on the field of battle by both the French and American Governments, and have a son, a stepson, and a son-in-law in this war.

I am as anxious, certainly, as you are or anyone else to keep this country out of future wars, as I believe that modern wars are the greatest curse, not only to civilization, but to religion and to the happiness and welfare of the people. I therefore think, in all fairness, that your readers should know that I voted for the Fulbright resolution in favor of international cooperation to maintain world peace; that I voted for the U. N. R. R. A. to feed and rehabilitate the peoples of Europe; that I introduced in my own name and had passed in Congress by a unanimous vote (which is a very unusual honor to be given to a minority Member), a bill urging that the women and children in the occupied nations of Europe should be furnished with food, milk, and the essentials of life to prevent millions of women and innocent children from dying from rickets, tuberculosis, and mass starvation. I know of nothing that I would not do to bring about a just and lasting peace by way of international cooperation. I am not, however, in favor after this war has been won of using our armed forces to make Europe safe for Communism, when the war was fought to preserve small nations against oppression from large and ruthless neighbors.

I pray that a just peace may be realized and that the territorial integrity and independence of the smaller nations may be preserved and, if so, no one will go further in international cooperation to maintain a lasting peace than myself. I am not, however, in favor of setting up a superstate and sacrificing our independence, or setting up a world-wide glorified W. P. A. with our own money. Although I did seek in every way to keep this country out of war before Pearl Harbor, I shall do everything within my power and influence to promote a just and enduring peace—not one that will continue for 20 or 25 years—but one, I hope, that will prevail for 100 years, to safeguard the lives of not only our sons and grandsons, but other generations as well.

You can assure your readers that regardless of politics or partisanship, so far as I am concerned, world wars shall not happen again, but to bring this about there must be a just peace in order to be a lasting peace; that is close to my heart, and there is no sacrifice I will not make to attain a lasting and enduring peace.

Trusting that you will do me the courtesy of publishing this letter which contains my views on international cooperation, and with kind regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

HAMILTON FISH.

Hon. Joaquin Miguel Elizalde

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMMET O'NEAL
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Speaker, for several years Joaquin Miguel Elizalde was the Resident Commissioner in the Congress of the United States representing the Commonwealth of the Philippines. His host of friends in Congress regret deeply that he will no longer be one of us, and I have heard expressions from many, many Members of Congress that his friendship, ability, and splendid personality will be greatly missed. Mike Elizalde's record as a businessman, a patriot and a statesman is most outstanding. A short biography of his life fully justifies that statement.

Joaquin Miguel Elizalde finished his education in England and Switzerland; was chairman of the board of directors, Elizalde & Co., Inc., industrialists and financiers, Manila, P. I.; he was president of the National Development Co., Manila, and Cebu Portland Cement Co. in 1934; was economic adviser to President Manuel L. Quezon in 1937; a member of National Economic Council in 1937; chairman of subcommittee on finance, Joint Preparatory Committee on Philippine Affairs in 1937; was Philippine envoy to the International Sugar Conference, London, 1936–37; a member of Council of State in 1938; at present a major, cavalry reserve, Philippine Army; he was appointed Resident Commissioner to the United States on September 29, 1938; was appointed by President Manuel Quezon as member of Philippine Cabinet, without portfolio, and member of the Council of State on September 29, 1941; was appointed member of President's War Cabinet in 1942; chairman of the Philippine delegation of the Conference Institute of Pacific Relations held at Mont Tremblant in December 1942; was chairman of the Philippine delegation to the United Nations Conference on Food and Agriculture held at Hot Springs, Va., in May 1943; appointed as Philippine representative to the United Nations Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture, July 1943; Philippine representative to the Council of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, Atlantic City, N. J., November 1943.

He represented the Commonwealth of the Philippines gloriously during the war period. His abilities are widely recognized in this country and abroad. As great as they are, he will be missed chiefly because of his rare and charming personality, and his great capacity for making friends. Throughout the membership of the House, he had an entree which assured the cooperation of his colleagues in any problem in which he was interested. Many of us have envied him as to his ability to accomplish that which he undertook to do. His fine intelligence, persistence, and sound sense are great assets, but his personality and his understanding of human nature are even rarer. The friendship and best wishes of hundreds of his colleagues go with him wherever his future journey may lead.

Address of Hon. Josephus Daniels

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD D. COOLEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Josephus Daniels to the graduating class of the University of North Carolina, August 30, 1944:

When I confided to an old friend that the members of your class had done me the honor of asking me to deliver the commencement address, he advised: "Decline it with thanks." He proceeded to say that this class is graduating in a day when every door of opportunity will be blocked, and every avenue of achievement closed by the war. He added that the fighting would be followed by a night of chaos and gloom. He urged if I essayed to speak at all, I commiserate with you in that your unlucky star has brought you to graduation when, through no fault of your own, the dreams of usefulness and success cannot be realized.

As I reflected upon the advice of this pessimistic Gloomy Gus, I recalled a story told in normal days which ran something like this: An ambitious youth went to a college presided over by a visionless dean whose demeanor almost caused an inscription to be written over the entrance—"Let him who enters here leave hope behind." The young man said: "I wish to enter college." A voice as cheerless as from the sepulchre asked: "And then?" The would-be matriculate replied: "I hope by applying myself diligently to complete the course and graduate with honor." Mercilessly the dean inquired: "And then?" The applicant replied: "I will study law, seek a degree, and hope to become an honor to the profession." From out of what seemed a cavern proceeded: "And then?" The answer: "I hope to win the confidence of my countrymen and be elevated to the bench." Again came: "And then?", as from an avenger. The answer: "I hope to win the love of a beautiful girl and establish a happy home." Once more demanded the voice, "And then?" Being thus called upon to live his whole life before he had really passed the threshold, the disillusioned youth grabbed his hat and ran from the college campus leaving hope behind. That was in normal times.

What if that application had been made to such a dean in the day of war tragedy in which we live? He doubtless would have convinced some youths they had failed before they started life.

Instead of commiserating with you, I bring congratulations that you are privileged to come on the stage at a time that will challenge every faculty and aspiration and in which the highest rewards will come to those who overcome and take the heights. Truly I can say to you and all youths anxious about what lies ahead:

> "We are living, we are dwelling
> In a grand and awful time,
> In an age on ages telling,
> To be living is sublime."

You do not need to be told that this era is truly described as "a grand and awful time." Mourning flowers on the doors of thousands of homes, and dislocation in many lives speaks the sorrow and distress. These, and doubts about what the future holds in store, make this truly in many ways an "awful time." But does it not hold the promise of a "grand time" of reconstruction and achievement in which to be living is "sublime"? I counsel you to look beyond the clouds into the morrow of victory. Let us in the darkness remember that, though war is ugly and venomous, it wears yet a precious jewel in its head. The knightly deeds of our chivalric men in the armed service glorify our humanity and illumine our sky. They forecast the better world that is to be in which the "four freedoms" will cast out the devils responsible for this holocaust. The counsel of the sage of Craigenputtach is as applicable to you as to the generation for whose guidance it was written. Let us take it as a light to our pathway as we go out from this campus. "On the whole," said Carlyle, "a man must not complain of his 'element,' of his 'time,' or the like. It is thriftless work to do so. His time is bad. Well then he is there to make it better."

How will you make your world better? Certainly not by grousing or taking the advice of the flabby materialist commencement speaker a score of years ago who gave as the certain road to success: "Marry your boss's daughter." Rather, though not inveighing against unasked advice where love leads, I counsel you to marry yourselves to a righteous, unpopular cause, and lose yourself in complete consecration to it. You may ask how to determine whether an unpopular cause is righteous, seeing that unrighteous causes are camouflaged as pure and demagogs masquerade as patriots. If your education has not given you the acumen to differentiate between the true and the false, I give you this perfect rule: Watch where those who have opinions for sale and those who put their convictions on the auction block. Then go and enlist in the opposing army. You will be sure to find yourself in a temporary minority which is destined to win if it is truly righteous, and if valiant men enroll under its banner.

There are righteous causes calling for crusaders. I beg you to begin at Jerusalem—in your home town—and not imitate Mrs. Jellyby, complaisant in every crisis, who left the children of her dirty and disorderly home to their own devices while she gave a sweet smile and a far-away look turned upon distant Africa, busy knitting sweaters for the inhabitants of Borrioboola-Gha. The country is full of self-appointed world fixers who are drawing blueprints of the post-war world by men—men who do not know in which ward they vote or the name of their congressman and who have never turned a hand to end the slums or stenches in their own backyards—without training or experience they think themselves peculiarly competent to mark off the metes and bounds and subdivide Europe and Asia. Let me impress upon you, first of all, that near your doorstep you will find wrongs that need redressing and righteous causes waiting for champions.

"Brighten the corner right where you are" is more than a revival hymn. It is a command to drive out the crooks, the sharks, and other evil doers infesting every town and city. Only by fighting for a clean community fireside will your muscles be toughened and your capacity be enlarged to effect reforms in larger terrains. No man can draw a blueprint for the world—it is just now the absorbing indoor occupation—unless he has used his prentice hand to build more stately and sanitary edifices in the community in which he lives. To justify your right of citizenship and leadership, you must incarnate the virtues you expound. One ounce of example is worth a ton of precept.

There never was a time when there was such need for strong men of vision to translate into civic life the same new character of invention and instruments which have revolutionized warfare. A way must be found by which radar, robots, tanks, and other devices can be applied to the location and destruction of the diseases, the poisonous bugs, the malarialism, the ignorances, and the prejudices which prey upon mankind. We need in the days ahead creative Edisons, Wrights, Pasteurs, to name only three pioneers of progress. Will not some member of this class guide robots to the destruction of the pestilences that lay in wait for their fellowmen?

Just now, coming out of the atmosphere of a world in arms, you will be confronted with a challenge to enroll in a real battle for a righteous cause that will call for opposition of powerful influences. Gold braid and brass hats and decorations, associated with valor and victory, will make a strong appeal to carry over into peacetimes the trappings of war.

Already, while fighting is in progress, there is propaganda to put all the youth in uniform. There are not wanting those who approve the Mussolini and Hitler plan of introducing military training in the elementary schools. Others would confine it to the high schools. The argument is that it makes for physical strength and disciplines youth. True, but it was on the athletic fields of Rugby—not compulsory drilling that won the Battle of Waterloo. When all youths in our schools receive athletic training, as they should, they will be fit and ready for the duties of peace and war.

Advocates of compulsory military training are in four classes: 1. Those who think the schools cannot insure physical fitness; 2. Those who lack faith that post-war wisdom can organize and undergird lasting peace; 3. Those who are congenital militarists; 4. Those who wish standing armies ready for colonial exploitation or imperialism.

It will be unpopular for awhile to combat this un-American doctrine. All the more reason for enlisting and battling against permitting the evil of militarism to get its feet under the tent in a democracy which it would endanger. This country was born in hostility to colonialism. The introduction of compulsory military training would turn back the clock of self-government and democracy. Fight against it and all other encroachments upon individual liberty.

As you enroll in the army for democracy and for personal liberty, threatened tomorrow by the glamour of the goose step, you will be upheld by this summon in the immortal words of Matthew Arnold:

> "Charge once more, then and be dumb!
> Let the victors when they come,
> When the forts of folly fall,
> Find thy body by the wall."

Black-Pencil Ballots

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GRANT FURLONG

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. FURLONG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Evening Star of August 31, 1944:

BLACK-PENCIL BALLOTS

Just why the Ohio election laws should require that absentee ballots be marked with black lead pencils is one of those legislative mysteries that has to be filed away among the unsolved crimes against common sense. On the face of it there would seem to be no reason under the sun why a ballot marked with a red pencil, a blue pencil, or even with pen and ink, is not just as valid and just as deserving of being counted as one that is marked with a black pencil. But a different view seems to prevail in the Buckeye State, and a controversy of no small proportions is well under way.

The State auditor, a Democrat, is threatening to file suit to compel the election authorities to send a pencil, presumably one with black lead, to every soldier requesting an absentee ballot. But that is a poor solution. Some soldiers, like some civilians, probably have a way of mislaying their pencils and, in the heat of battle, a mislaid pencil can be a very difficult thing to find.

A simpler remedy, it would seem, would be to change the law. But Ohio's Governor Bricker, who is also the Republican Vice Presidential candidate, is opposed to this. He says that it is a "clean politics" law, designed to protect the "secrecy of the ballot," and that the State election boards were being instructed to count only those ballots that are marked with black pencils.

All of this is confusing, to say the least. But there is one day of hope. The governor, after thinking the matter over, said he had not closed the door on the issue and that he would study it further. Perhaps this will lead to the conclusion that the law is a silly one and that it ought to be changed. After all, the inability to find the right pencil at the right time is as apt to be a Republican failing, and it may be that quite a few of Ohio's soldiers will want to vote the Republican ticket.

Vermont Republicans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted, I am including as an extension of remarks the address which I delivered at the Republican State convention at Montpelier, Vt., on the forenoon of August 30:

Mr. Chairman, a man who heard Abraham Lincoln, the first Republican President, deliver the immortal address at Gettysburg, says we are all mistaken when we emphasize "'of' the people, 'by' the people, and 'for' the people." Lincoln said, "of the 'people,' by the 'people,' and for the 'people.'" There is a big difference. It is the responsibility of the Republican Party to see that the people realize that difference, and the desperateness of their situation, to take advantage of their possibly last opportunity to save themselves.

It is conceded that Nation-wide there will be cast the smallest vote next November ever cast in a Presidential election. The absence of so many citizens overseas and in employment away from home are two reasons.

It follows there is and there will be no great enthusiasm for candidates as such. It cannot be manufactured nor be relied upon to get out the vote, because the real enthusiasm of the people stems from their faith in themselves, their demonstrated ability to win the war, and intention to do so, and that right early. So they are not particularly interested in politics, post-war planning, or the election. They want the boys back home, victorious, and soon. However, we must make them understand and appreciate the fact that though they may win the war they may lose all for which they have fought, if the New Deal makes the peace. They can win the war and lose the peace.

We have met here today to dedicate ourselves to make the road on which America can march toward victory, toward opportunity, toward peace. We Vermont Republicans are determined to restore Republican leadership from the grass roots to the Presidency. And now.

It is easy to say, but difficult of accomplishment. As Governor Earl Warren, of California, said the other day, "Whether we win as a party is of less importance to us than whether we win as a people."

The C. I. O. Political Action Committee recognizes the situation completely. It has been preparing for it for 2 years—or since it determined to back Mr. Roosevelt for a fourth term. Such a possibility, even, is a menace to democratic republican form of government any time, any place, or anywhere.

However, you just cannot laugh off the millions of political primers and pamphlets which have been and are being distributed Nation-wide and are still in preparation by this organization to do that very thing.

The years immediately ahead are the most critical we have ever faced—the years of decision when new patterns will be formed. The people, fed up with years of New Deal fallacies, tired and confused by war and post-war problems, need as never before to be kept alert and informed as to their political interests.

The 1944 elections will decide many things. How the war will end. How secure our peace will be. And whether we shall have full employment and win our fight over a government by a man, poverty, illness, and ignorance, for one of law. Never before has it been so important to vote.

A crystal ball can't reveal your future—nor a pattern of tea leaves in the bottom of a cup. But the coming election will. Your dreams for a world of peace and freedom and security, and the preservation of free enterprise at home will depend on the kind of President and Congress that you help elect. You want men who will truly represent the interests of the people. To get them you must understand the issues of this election.

Philip Murray tells the C. I. O. plenty as he hands his primer to them with instructions as to how to get the vote. "You must vote," he says, and makes available the necessary funds to serve the best interest of the people. His ideas are neither new, novel, nor patented. Though his advice to his partisans is not intended to be instructions for the Republicans it may very well be read by and taken to heart by us as such. Victory in a political campaign is spelled by votes, and to get the votes out this year is the elemental effort that will mean victory or defeat. Organization is the slogan.

The fact is that as Republicans the last few years we have depended too much on speeches and big talk. We've drawn big crowds at our rallies and got a lot of applause, but when the votes were counted the other fellows' candidate had them and was elected.

It must not happen again. We must organize from the bottom to the top. And that means that everybody must work as never before. We should put up or shut up now, or forever after hold our peace.

All the Republican governors and each and every Republican Member of Congress may talk night and day till election day without avail, and we may lose the election for—

"It ain't the guns nor the armament
Nor the Army as a whole,
But the close cooperation
Of every bloomin' soul."

It's organization which counts.

The issues are simple: Whether we are going to elect a government which will take our country along with the rest of the world into a peaceful and prosperous future, or whether we shall lie down and let the totalitarians run over us forever, as they smash democracy at home and start sowing the seed of World War No. 3. The answer is to be found in the vote of the people on November 7. It is your responsibility, my responsibility, and particularly the responsibility of the Republican Party.

The duty of the Republican Party is found in the situation which confronts us; its obligation to correct that state of affairs has been assumed and defined; its responsibility to do its duty, to discharge its obligation was never heavier nor greater since the day it became a power in politics.

What the people must be made to realize is that unless they save themselves this time, the government of, for, and by the people will have ceased to exist.

What the voters must understand and be made to appreciate is that these are not just words, but facts.

Crises are nothing new to the Republican Party. It has been well said that, "The Republican Party was born in a great crisis." The American people turned to it because they wanted to get safely, speedily through that crisis and get on their way again. Then as now, the Republican Party was called by the people to displace a regime of men who had grown tired, complacent and cynical in the business of government. Then as now, the Republican Party was called upon to replace a party that was torn with dissension and in revolt against itself. Then as now, the Republican Party was called by the people to furnish youth and vigor and vision.

Now, as then, the Republican Party will respond to that call. It will represent the Nation, the whole Nation and nothing but the Nation. It will devote itself fervently to the problems of the people and in everything it does the Constitution of the United States of America will be its guiding star. It will function through established law and not through the caprice of bureaucratic regulation. Its greatest concern will always be for those who have the greatest need. It will conduct Government openly where the people can see, discuss, and decide. It will operate less from the Government down and more from the people up. It will make wise and careful use of the people's money. It will keep the public's books in such a way as to allow the people to see how their money is used. It will see that taxes are just, visible, and designed to stimulate rather than punish. It will strengthen our great public school system, keep it under the control of State and local government, where it is responsive to the people, and prepare it to play a stronger part in the life of the Republic. It will promote peace in industry by stimulating good will between labor and management. It will free the agencies of public information from the domination of Government. It will make fully effective the immeasurable strength of the Nation by promoting good will and unit at home. It will not be cocksure in good times or depressed and cynical in bad times. It will direct our combined material and spiritual resources against the enemies of our country. It will make any sacrifice to achieve victory even one day sooner so our boys can come home. It will see to it that they are cared for when they do come home. It and we will honor them the rest of our lives.

The question is, Will the Republican Party rise to the occasion and be equal to its destiny? To ask that question is to ask whether Americans have the will to live.

It has been well said that our natural tendency to drift, our individual indifference to public duty, our lack of any positive policy at home or abroad are the results not of the attempt to do great things, and of failing, but of a long habit of not having to do great things. We are to blame for having done too little too late.

The Republican Party is challenged today as it never has been before. It must exert itself fully, and believe in and work out its destiny as the saviour of a Republican-Democratic form of government and a civilization which it comprehends.

If we comprehend our destiny we shall become equal to it. As Walter Lippmann said of America, I say in closing, "The vision is there, and our people do not need to perish."

The Republican Party, to paraphrase him, is now called to do what its founders and the pioneers always believed was the American task—to make the New World a place where the ancient faith can flourish anew, and its eternal promise at last be redeemed.

That is the challenge of this day.

Reconversion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, many Members of Congress and millions of civilian war workers have looked forward to the passage of legislation that will better prepare us for the transition from a war economy to a normal peacetime economy.

For the past several months committees of both the House and Senate have been studying post-war plans. All recognize the fact that waging war is the responsibility of the Federal Government. Our soldiers and sailors do not fight as New Yorkers, as Ohioans, or in the name of any other State. It is the responsibility of the Federal Government, not only to actually fight the war, but to accept the task of changing over our industries to meet the war needs. It is just as much our task to make certain that our industries, which include buildings, equipment, and labor, are properly set going on peacetime pursuits.

Frankly, the bill now before us is disappointing. Its passage will not do any harm but neither will it be much help to anyone. Its passage could be harmful if we took the position that we have done all we can do toward preparing for reconversion. As I see it, all this bill does is to approve the provisions of the President's executive order creating the office now filled by the Honorable James F. Byrnes and, second, it does provide that if any State's unemployment funds are exhausted, the Federal Government will loan that State the money needed to keep the fund solvent.

I feel certain that if extended open hearings had been held on this legislation some plan could have been devised that would provide adequate unemployment compensation without wrecking the State's control of this activity. Without too much trouble we could have found out how many men and women have moved into Connecticut, using Connecticut for example, to work in our war industries. Providing for them is the responsibility of the Federal Government. If any, or all, of the people who move into a given State to do war work become unemployed, it is the Federal Government that should see that they can get back home and that they receive unemployment compensation until they can find another job. The money needed to do this should be paid into the Connecticut Unemployment Insurance Fund by the Federal Government without waiting for that fund to become depleted. Every other State should be treated the same way.

How can we justify paying unemployment compensation to men who have earned large wages in private industry and then refuse the same benefits to the girls who have been working down here in the War and Navy Departments for $1,440 or $1,680 a year and paying the high cost of living here in Washington? Employees of many war factories can look forward to work on peacetime products as soon as the tooling up has been completed, but thousands of the employees of the Federal Government, whether employed in offices or in shipyards and arsenals, know that when they are laid off their services will never again be needed by this Government. As I see it, we have a greater responsibility to provide for the employees of the Federal Government than any other group mentioned during this debate. Included as Government employees, in fact at the head of the list, should come those who have manned and are manning our merchant marine.

The preparation of legislation to meet the needs of reconversion is the responsibility of the party in power. Leadership has been sadly lacking during the preparation of this legislation. Is the President opposed to unemployment compensation for Government employees? Is this committee bill an administration bill? We must assume that it is, even though his party leaders have been strangely silent during this debate.

The ruling of the Chairman, sustaining points of order raised against several amendments, make it absolutely necessary that we give immediate thought to the problems not adequately dealt with in the present legislation. I am not criticizing the ruling of the Chair, as I realize that no other rulings were possible.

If there is a record vote on this measure I shall vote "no," not because I am opposed to its provisions, but rather because it fails to meet our needs.

Poland After 5 Years of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS S. GORDON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, 5 years ago today the war engulfed the world. On September 1, 1939, the Nazi Germans invaded Poland, without declaring war, and Hitler started on the Vistula plains his modern blitzkrieg experiment. The Poles, outnumbered unproportionately, as they were not given a chance to mobilize, their armies tremendously overpowered in mechanized war equipment, especially in tanks, heavy artillery, and airplanes, nevertheless fought gloriously, paying a huge toll to the unchained demons of war, and at the same time to the gods of democracy and freedom. Poland's cities and villages were burned and destroyed, her innocent people robbed, ravaged, and murdered. Millions of them were expropriated and forcibly transferred to distant, foreign lands; her valiant defenders decimated and driven off from their own country by sheer violence and barbarous methods of German warfare. It really was not war, it was terror and extermination. Yet the Poles never gave up nor surrendered; in fact, they never, not for one single day, ceased to fight, struggling against all enemies, all chances, all odds.

The Government of Poland had to leave the unfortunate country, moved to France, and later to England, relinquishing the land and the people to underground authorities, to conduct affairs as well as possible, and to continue the strife unrelentingly. Since then, during this long 5 years of privation, moral and physical torture, infinite and unreserved sacrifices of this whole crucified nation, the Poles have never swerved from the righteous path of honor and fidelity to the ideals of democracy, liberty, and to the sublime goals of our allied nations. There never was a collaborant, as Laval, among the Poles, nor was there a Quisling-Judas in Poland. Semper fidelis she is justly called in history, which means—forever true and faithful.

During all these unbearably long years of Poland's via dolorosa, the way of martyrdom, the entire nation labored perseveringly and fought undauntedly. Today the Poles are entering with us into the sixth year of this atrocious war, and disregarding all miseries, sufferings and, I am sorry to say, disappointments and disillusions coming even from their allies, they still struggle heroically, hoping for justice and believing in the good judgment of our fighting democracies.

They hope, as we all do, that this will be the last year of this misery of war, and that the near future will bring to Poland, and to all democratic nations, a triumphant victory, lasting peace, and absolute freedom in self-determination of political existence.

On the day of this grave anniversary Poland looks up to the United States and to our allies, with expectation and confidence, still unshaken, with spirit still unconquered, proceeding in her work, in her strife, in her faithfulness for this common cause, which one of our greatest Presidents, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, defined in so simple yet so powerful words, that "this war must make the world a better place to live in." The Poles hope, in this better future, for a whole, free, and independent Poland. It is the only worthy goal of this great nation, which has behind her over 1,000 years of old culture, so valuable to mankind. For an upright, patriotic Pole there cannot be any other orientation than the desire of a free and independent Poland, and of her undivided territory, for after all the Poles had to go through in history there should be no more partitions for Poland. In Europe and in the cultural world, there must be room for the Polish cause and for a free, independent Poland.

Europe and the whole world will never experience permanent peace as long as the Polish question shall remain in neglect and oblivion or as long as the only just solution shall be put off with half measures.

The Poles are a peace-loving people; they desire peace just as they need breath for their lungs, but it cannot be peace at any price, not peace at the price of a compromise with conscience, with their national honor, peace of another patchwork. If there be peace, it must be based on justice; it must right the wrongs perpetrated, and restore what was stolen and seized by a stronger power. Human society has long ago reached this stage of understanding, that one individual cannot seize the property of his neighbor with impunity; the nations, however, collectively continue to maintain in power the criminal maxim "might before right." It certainly is high time to change this injurious attitude.

Unsatisfactory solution after this war of the question of nations, hitherto oppressed by stronger political systems, will be only a new deceit, a new beguiling of the peoples, a phantom of peace. As long as violence continues to exist among nations, as long as a nation numerically smaller and weaker must fear the more powerful who fatten at the expense of the neighbors as it is in the case of Poland, just so long there cannot be any sense in talking of a brotherhood of nations and of peace among them.

A free Poland will constitute a guarantee of peace, and will help to maintain the European equilibrium. A free and independent Polish Nation will render the world services still more valuable than those given in previous years and centuries. Willingly the Poles offer their lives for their freedom, and for liberty of other peoples. They always were and still are undauntedly faithful knights of great ideals, which uplift humanity to God.

One of the greatest Polish masters of literature, one of the most famous of all times, and of all men, Henryk Sienkiewicz, during the First World War, wrote about his country, then as now, unhappy victim of striving powers. His inspiring words are today as actual as they were a quarter of a century ago. I quote them:

In the midst of a terrible war that caused unimaginable misery, the demons of death and destruction now dispute the empires of the world. Thousands upon thousands of soldiers are dying on the fields of battle, and millions of peaceful human beings are perishing of hunger and of all possible atrocities. One country has been more specially a victim of this conflict and suffering—it is Poland. Poland has been crushed and devastated by the iron heel of war. The blood of my unhappy country cries out for Divine justice. From the banks of the Nieman to the summits of the Carpathians fire has destroyed the towns and villages, and over the whole of this huge, desolated country—the specter of famine has spread out its black wings. All labor and industry have been swept away. The plough is rusted, the peasants have neither grain nor cattle. The artisan is idle, all factories have been confiscated or destroyed. The hearths are extinguished, and disease and misery prevail. The aged and infirm have no shelter, little children, stretching out arms to their mothers for bread, receive in answer—but tears. Of such starving people, crying out for aid, listen, Christian nations; there are millions of them. Has Poland no right to assistance? To protection? To justice? Each unfortunate nation has such right in the name of humanity, but the Polish Nation has also other claims to plead her cause before the world. For centuries she was the rampart of civilization, the defense of Christian culture in struggle with the barbarians. She ever fought side by side with all defenders of freedom. Where was there any noble cause in which Poland did not shed her blood? Where was human suffering, which she did not attempt to alleviate? Her genius, her labors, her creative powers, have written Poland's name upon many pages of the world's history. Therefore in the name of universal fraternity of democratic nations, in the name of the teachings of Christ, I appeal to the civilized world—protect Poland and help her. May the Polish Nation survive this period of trial, strengthened in her justified hope for a glorious dawn of her resurrection.

Political Action Committee of the C. I. O.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Hollywood Citizen-News of July 21, 1944:

This year's national primaries mark the first entry into local politics of Sidney Hillman's Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. They also mark the first time that any pressure group, nationally organized, has undertaken to dictate who shall, and who shall not be, elected to public office even in local contests. It's the first time any cunning conniver ever had the monumental insolence to tell the American people who shall and who shall not represent them under the American way of doing business, even down to such local matters as the governors of their States.

Hillman, the new self-activated one-man United States Government, has been an agitator and an organizer for most of his 57 years, but aspiring to the unofficial ownership of the United States is his magnus opus to date. He is a native of Zagare, Lithuania, when it was an official part of Russia, and although he is a very polished gentleman, famed for his beautifully tailored clothing, he still speaks with the accent of his homeland.

The grandson of a rabbi and the son of a well-to-do tradesman, he began an education for the rabbinate at the age of 13 at Yeshivah, the Jewish seminary in Kaunas, also called Kovno, but instead he spent 8 months in Czarist jails for trying to change the government. He started early.

At 20, he headed for the United States via England, where he stopped in Manchester long enough to clerk in the shop of a wealthy uncle. August of the same year, however, saw him an immigrant at Ellis Island, whence he proceeded onward to Chicago.

There, 5 girls, 1 of whom is the present Mrs. Hillman, started a strike. It spread to 40,000 garment workers and became a cause celebre. All the legitimate social reformers and the self-starting do-gooders of the time eventually mixed into it. Included were Jane Addams, Clarence Darrow, Mrs. Raymond Robbins, and some more. Hillman, already a whizz at impressing big shots and worming in where the real business was, had performed so nobly in the role of errand runner and liaison agent that the local people passed him on to New York where he became identified with the crowd around Lillian Wald's Henry Street settlement.

Here he met sundry liberals and idealists, including the Honorable Frances Perkins, who became his close friend and sponsor, and a long list of others both inside and outside of labor. These powerful friends got him a job as conciliator with the Cloakmakers' Union, and with characteristic ability to bore inward, he was on his way. He really didn't have the stuff to hold the conciliator's job and was about to lose it when a battle broke out in the ranks of the long-established Union Garment Workers.

Hillman moved in with the dissidents and his revolutionary training paid off. They split off into the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America with Hillman as president. This job he held for 26 years, and through a period of labor terrorism in New York into which gangsters mixed and during which men were killed.

Through continuing friendship with Madam Perkins and other liberals high in the New Deal, Hillman finally moved into national prominence as a member of the advisory board of the N. R. A. He retired from this in 1942. The reason officially given was bad health. The Washington rumor was that Madam Perkins soured on him. Importance had gone to his head. Maybe he was already dreaming of ruling America through dictating to its voters.

Hillman came back as the head of something brand new in this land, a Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. It looked illegal, and it probably is. For 20 years in this land there's been an act of Congress prohibiting any corporation to contribute to a political campaign fund. The law was fully respected. There's never been even one test case. Unions, by another act, were specifically named corporations within the meaning of this prohibition.

Hillman claimed he was outside the law because the P. A. C. was educational in character, designed merely to educate the people in the business of voting, and to urge them to vote. Still it endorsed candidates as in the present election, marking this one for the purge, that one for election, crossing party lines and thus building a P. A. C. national governmental pattern beholden to Hillman and evidently to be dictated to by him.

The House, the Senate, various individuals such as the G. O. P.'s Harrison Spangler, appealed to Attorney General Biddle. Nothing happened, the unofficial opinion being given that P. A. C. intrusion was all right in primaries but might be questionable in finals. Hillman promptly moved to get around that. This about ends the primaries. Taking over now will be another Hillman purge project with a slightly different name, and a slightly different procedure. Contributions to it will be "voluntary," but envelopes for the "voluntary contributions" have been dutifully handed to C. I. O. members.

Ostensibly Hillman is working for the fourth term, but Hitler ostensibly was working for Germany. Freedom means the right to vote in freedom and to run the same way. If Americans accept this dictation, or even, the blessings of this sort of dictation, they're no longer Americans. Heil Hillman or some other master mind isn't too far away.

Progress—And a Suggestion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Globe of August 30, 1944:

PROGRESS—AND A SUGGESTION

When the Big Four—the United States, Great Britain, France, and Italy on that occasion—were deep in discussion at Paris during the winter of 1918–19, a hullabaloo arose because the press was not admitted to meetings at which peace treaties were being formulated.

After this uproar had proceeded for some weeks, testy Premier Georges Clemenceau snapped, "You cannot negotiate agreements among states on the public street corner." And that was that.

Undersecretary of State Stettinius, answering the critics of secrecy at Dumbarton Oaks Conference, is more diplomatic. But he is nonetheless effective. His explanation of the procedure being followed in this semifinal effort of the Big Four to shape agreements on a new peace system is so reasonable that it will be extremely difficult to challenge his premises, or the precedents he adduces to support the present course of the conference.

For the benefit of the Congress—though he tactfully fails to press the object lesson too sharply home—he reviews the procedure of the Constitutional Convention, which met in secrecy and then piles in illustration after illustration taken from Senate and House procedure, as well as from the realm of business and international affairs. His argument is simple enough: The task of committees, of which the Dumbarton conferees comprise one, is to exchange views and formulate agreements. That task performed, the results can be offered for public study, debate, and decision.

Accompanying Mr. Stettinius' statement is a very important announcement that agreements have been reached on three major issues with respect to the proposed peace structure. There is to be an assembly, in which all peace-loving nations shall participate on the basis of sovereign equality; there is to be a council, composed of a smaller number of members in which the principal states will be joined by a number of other states to be elected periodically, and there is agreement that effective means must be instituted for peaceful settlement of disputes, including an international court of justice to handle justiciable questions, and other agencies for the maintenance of peace and security.

This means that the program outlined by President Roosevelt several weeks ago, presenting this country's idea of the peace structure, has won approval from Britain and Russia. That it does not mean agreements have been reached as yet on problems of function and power, is obvious. Nor has the difficult issue of the coordinated use of force to thwart aggression been worked through to agreement.

Progress is, nevertheless, excellent. The attitudes of the participating governments afford promise that the thornier problems are manageable. Apart from the nature and use of peace enforcement machinery, the greatest problem before the delegates has to do with the role, the rights, and the freedoms of smaller nations.

In this matter it is worthy of notice that neither the present war nor the First World War was inaugurated by a small nation. Both were engineered through the machinations of great powers—usually working on small nations as pawns. The proposed anxiety of the great states about the future peaceful intentions of their smaller neighbors is, therefore, curious—to put the matter mildly. Would it not be sensible to be done with such pretenses and, in framing the peace structure, to require clear official pledges by all members—including the most powerful—that none will undertake to intervene, directly or indirectly, in the domestic politics or policy of any other, regardless of its size? Or attempt to exert pressure from without, affecting the make-up of governments? Or the freedom of the peoples to decide these matters themselves?

Such a pledge would hobble imperialism. It would also guarantee the smaller states genuine sovereignty.

Regulate Production and Distribution of Margarine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Mr. John D. Jones, Jr., of Racine, Wis., has for over 20 years been recognized by the people of Wisconsin as one of the outstanding farm leaders of our State. He is a man of the soil. His practical background and his keen interest and understanding have found him all these years closely associated with what was best for the agricultural welfare of our Nation. This devotion to the soil and all that is associated with the soil has made him turn a deaf ear, time after time, to the pleadings of his friends to accept political office. His statement which follows is a practical presentation of the farmers' attitude toward oleo and the coconut cow:

STATEMENT OF JOHN D. JONES, JR., REPRESENTING HOARD'S DAIRYMAN, FORT ATKINSON, WIS.

Mr. JONES. My name is John D. Jones, Jr. I am associated with Hoard's Dairyman, a dairy publication published at Fort Atkinson, Wis.

Senator AIKEN. Are you the Mr. Jones who used to be Commissioner of Agriculture for the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES. I was Commissioner of Agriculture for that State from 1923 to 1927, Senator AIKEN.

Senator AIKEN. All right. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. JONES. I will speak briefly from an outline. And by way of introduction, would state that the position of Hoard's Dairyman with respect to the production and sale of oleomargarine was first established and enunciated by the founder of the publication, the late W. D. Hoard, one-time Governor of the State, who, the records will show, appeared in these Halls on many an occasion 40 years ago in the same type of undertaking in which we are engaged today. Following him, A. J. Glover, now the senior editor of Hoard's Dairyman, took up the cudgels on behalf of the dairy industry in controversial matters involving the industry and the producers of oleomargarine. And it is from an editorial prepared by Mr. Glover, which appeared in the January 25, 1936, issue of Hoard's Dairyman that I will take my text.

This editorial was preceded by many other editorials, and followed, all of which adhered to the position stated therein. [Reading:]

"For nearly 50 years the dairy industry has been committed to the policy that oleomargarine should sell on its own merits, and in its own clothes. Legislation has been enacted to accomplish this end.

"One of the great principles of pure-food legislation is that the consumer is entitled to know what he is purchasing, and that commodities should be sold on their own merits, and the manufacture and sale of food products which are unwholesome and deleterious to health should be prohibited. We believe all fair-minded people subscribe to this great principle in pure-food legislation.

"While oleomargarine is taxed ¼ cent a pound, and that colored in semblance of yellow butter is taxed 10 cents a pound. The purpose of this legislation is to force oleomargarine to sell on its own merits, and to stop the sale of oleomargarine when colored in semblance of yellow butter.

"Yellow is the trade-mark of butter. It is not possible to make white butter. By requiring this demarcation in yellow between butter and its so-called substitutes, the consumer has been given greater protection, for in the early days, and to some extent now, oleomargarine was and is sold as butter. Selling oleomargarine as butter is a fraud upon the consumer, and injurious to the dairy farmer."

And then Mr. Glover went on:

"We have a law similar to that governing the sale of oleomargarine applied to grades of butter. Renovated butter is taxed ¼ cent a pound and adulterated butter, 10 cents a pound, the purpose being to stop the fraud committed when renovated butter is sold as creamery butter and to stop the manufacture and sale of adulterated butter. There are those who have not always agreed with this legislation, but no one will deny that the purpose back of the legislation to make oleomargarine and adulterated butter sell on their own merits is sound."

That expresses the position taken by Hoard's Dairyman. I wish to say that from my own observation, from my association with the dairy industry—and I was born on a dairy farm, which I now own and operate—I am forced to the conclusion that the history of the production and sale of oleomargarine in the United States up to and including the present time, reveals a purpose on the part of some manufacturers and some distributors to resort to misrepresentation and deception to effect the sale of an inferior imitation of genuine butter.

That is my personal observation and conclusion, and that assertion is based on one of my earliest recollections as a boy in the nineties, back on the farm, where father kept cows and mother made dairy butter. We received one paper a week. It was a weekly paper. We did not have many publications in those days. And one of my earliest recollections is listening to father read from the paper an account of how a local grocer in Racine, Wis., had been haled into court for selling what was then called butterine, as butter. That was back in the nineties.

I then come on to 1911, and in order that there may be no question about the fact, I turn to Funk & Wagnalls' New Standard Dictionary, edition of 1932, page 1719, in which the authors of the dictionary define oleomargarine. They call it artificial butter, and then to present something informative with respect to the product and some of the views concerning it to the readers and the users of the dictionary, the authors of the dictionary first print a letter from one of the large manufacturers of oleomargarine, which is as follows:

"Oleomargarine is made from oleo oil, neutral lard, vegetable oils, milk and cream, and pure butter, although butter is not used in all grades. In order to obtain the desired flavor, all the fats used are of necessity the very finest obtainable. Oleo oil is made from the selected fat of the steer, and neutral lard is made from the leaf fat of the hog. After removing the animal heat, these are chilled in cold water, washed, melted at a low temperature and in the case of the oleo oil the hard portion, known as oleostearin, is removed by pressing. The mixed fats are churned with milk and cream and a considerable percentage of the very finest pure butter is also added in most cases, the quantity of butter depending upon the grade of butterine and flavor desired. In some cases coloring matter is added, such as is used in pure butter. After churning, the oleomargarine is worked, salted, and packed just as in the production of pure butter"—with the signature of a large producer of oleomargarine appearing in the dictionary's account. There is a formal admission on the part of a producer that it was his purpose to lean on the dairy industry, to use dairy products, to create the impression that the imitation product was something closely akin to genuine yellow butter, which has been known and regarded as the gold standard in food qualities for many, many centuries.

In conjunction with this letter, the authors of the dictionary publish, on the same page, the same edition, an excerpt from the book of Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, Foods and Their Adulteration, pages 189-190. Dr. Wiley, as most people in this room know, was one of the foremost advocates of pure foods, adequate pure-food legislation and its enforcement. The excerpt reads as follows:

"The manufacture of oleomargarine can take place in the United States only under the supervision of officials of the Internal Revenue. All oleomargarine which is artificially colored a yellow or yellowish tint in semblance of natural butter pays an internal revenue tax of 10 cents per pound. Oleomargarine uncolored pays a revenue of one-fourth cent per pound. There has been a constant disposition on the part of dishonest manufacturers and dealers, since the time when oleomargarine became a commercial commodity, to sell it as butter. With a more rigid National and State inspection, it is reasonable to hope that this fraudulent use of oleomargarine can be avoided, and the pure, unadulterated article under its own name be supplied to those who prefer it either on account of its properties or its price. The components used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, when properly made, are all wholesome and digestible materials such as are consumed in eating various food products. It does not appear, therefore, that any valid objection can be made against the use of oleomargarine from a physiological or hygienic standpoint."

And then I come on a little further, to December 1943, and on December 10 of that year, 1943, I found this advertisement in a leading Chicago daily paper, an advertisement of a popular brand of margarine. It is about a little less than a quarter of a page ad, and after giving some attention to what the club women of the community think about this particular brand of oleomargarine, the manufacturer goes on to state, in bold type, that this product is "Made from pasteurized fat-free milk and vegetable oils." That passage is featured. That is followed by the statement that this margarine "is a scientific blend of two of America's basic foods," meaning pasteurized fat-free milk and vegetable oils.

Now, inasmuch as it is required that oleomargarine contain not less than 80 percent of fat, and in this case it is vegetable fat, and inasmuch as there is probably 12 or 14 percent of moisture in addition to the fat, and 1 or 2 percent of solids, obviously there could not be much more than a trace of milk solids, not fat, in this preparation. And yet, according to the representations of the manufacturer, the fat-free milk is featured. The uninformed consumer might easily be led to believe that milk solids formed the major portion, or at least a very substantial portion of the ultimate product. And I submit that that is misrepresentation and constitutes deception. That occurred in December 1943.

And on May 18, 1944, in the Cincinnati Times-Star, appeared another advertisement of a prominent manufacturer of oleomargarine, announcing the "Whole milk margarine, better than any other. 1. Whole milk with all the cream left in. * * * the pure, nourishing, edible oils are mixed with whole milk, an ingredient which adds even greater quality" to the product, naming it.

"Enjoy the delicious flavor of—" naming the product—"the whole milk margarine."

Again, even assuming that whole milk is used—and the principal reason why milk was used in the first instance by the manufacturers was that they might by that use impart the flavor of butter to the imitation product—even assuming the use of whole milk, there can be only a small quantity of whole milk solids and whole milk fat.

We take the position that those who contend that the lower-income consumer groups should have made available to them a lower-cost spread for bread, and that this is impossible if reliance must be placed on butter, particularly at this time when butter is rationed, we take the position that if those who make that contention are sincere, they would be the first to favor the retention of existing legislation, because oleomargarine is available now to the consumers of this country, so far as Federal taxation goes, after the imposition of only a quarter of a cent tax. That means, however, that it must be sold with its natural color, which is white.

And in that connection, I wish to point out that white is not a reprehensible color. One of the finest dairy products I know of is cream cheese, which, I believe, was originated up here in Philadelphia, sold under a trade name, manufactured by a number of firms in America now, and in rather large volume normally, although I believe the production has been reduced somewhat during the war period. The color of that product is white, and always has been white. It is used as a spread, used in sandwiches, used in the preparation of salads. No objection has ever been raised to the color of cream cheese because it is white.

And then again there is another very fine, nutritious product that results from the processing of the lowly peanut—peanut butter—containing not only a high percentage of fat but very valuable protein; a product that has been on the market for years; that is relished by youngsters and adults as well; highly nutritious; sold in its natural color, which is brown; sold under its name, "peanut butter," without misrepresentation, without deception; and the dairy industry has never offered any objection whatsoever to the sale of peanut butter.

And we submit that there is no reason whatsoever why the needs of the low-income groups for something to supplement the limited amount of butter that is not available cannot be met, if the supply of oils is sufficient, under existing tax laws of the United States which permit uncolored margarine to move freely in interstate commerce with a tax of only a quarter of a cent a pound.

There is another point that I wish to make in connection with this controversy between the dairy industry and oleomargarine which, in my opinion, perhaps is more fundamental. It has within it the long-range view of public welfare. It has been well stated that American civilization rests on the 9 inches of top soil of American farms.

Recently I picked up a report of the United States Department of Agriculture, and there it was stated that in that area east of the Mississippi and south of the Ohio River several millions of acres of one-time fertile land had been ruined for the production of tillage crops by erosion.

In New England, along the east Atlantic coast, throughout the North Atlantic States group, in my own group of States in the Middle West, the North Central area, Wisconsin, Illinois, Minnesota, even that greatest agricultural State of them all—Iowa—there are millions of acres of land—good land—that due to the topography, the lay of the land, the slopes, the roughness in some cases, that land should be kept, so far as may be possible, permanently under grass or legumes, in order to hold that soil—to prevent it from blowing and washing away.

As a matter of fact, out of that territory that I have mentioned—the North Central area—millions of tons of that fine topsoil have already gone down the Mississippi River and are now part of the delta.

The dairy cows, the beef animals, and sheep are practically the only animals that can utilize grass and the coarse forages to advantage, and of the three the dairy cow is the most efficient converter of grass and forage into edible foods that we know of.

I imagine that in the South the dairy business is on the increase. Within a week I have been told by one cattleman in Wisconsin of the selling of 200 dairy cows in Georgia. I note that dairy leaders in the South, in the colleges and in the farm organizations, are urging that their eroded acres be placed under grass, so far as possible, and that dairy cows be used in that area. I sincerely hope that that may be done because, with our knowledge of dairy cattle, I am sure that dairy products can be produced economically down there, and thereby the incomes of the farm people will be raised, and the nutritional standards of the farm people, as well as those in the urban centers, will be raised as the result of the production of dairy products.

We are opposed, on the basis of the facts presented, to the passage of this bill.

Reconversion—Government Owned Land—Pearl Harbor Trials

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT A. GRANT
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the conference committee between the House and Senate are now attempting to iron out differences on two bills dealing with reconversion and demobilization.

The first bill sets up machinery for the greatest remainder sale in all history—the disposition of surplus property which Uncle Sam will have on his hands at the close of hostilities. The House and Senate bills disagreed on the make-up of the agency's top-side management. The House version would grant full authority to a single administrator. The Senate plans would vest authority in an eight-man board.

A reasonable compromise seems possible, a board to lay down policy and a single head to carry it out.

The problem of the disposal of our huge war surplus might easily become Uncle Sam's biggest home-front headache. It could make or break all our post-war plans looking toward production and more production—and with it jobs and more jobs.

Surplus-property disposal was a headache following World War No. 1. The total involved was $6,000,000,000. The Senate Small Business Committee recently estimated that the end of the war in Europe will find Uncle Sam with $103,000,000,000 worth of surplus property—everything from defense plants to jeeps. It is made up as follows:

Land and housing	$23,784,000,000
Industrial plants	16,554,000,000
Aircraft and parts	26,000,000,000
Ships and tankers	10,000,000,000
Army vehicles and parts	9,500,000,000
Civilian goods	7,450,000,000
Raw materials	4,588,000,000
Materials in process	3,700,000,000
Miscellaneous supplies	2,252,000,000
Total	103,828,000,000

Seventeen times greater than the problem following World War No. 1, and potentially 17 times the headache.

Major General Clay of the War Department recently testified that already $255,000,000 worth of Army matériel has been declared surplus. Our investment in the total estimated surplus-to-be is fully a third of our national debt.

The other bill would set up an Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion to be headed by a Director appointed by the President with Senate advice and consent. The Director would have jurisdiction over the Surplus Property Office and also the Office of Contract Settlement.

The principal controversy during debate on this bill centered around efforts to federalize the unemployment compensation system by the use of Federal funds, rather than existing State reserves, to make payments to jobless workers. This proposal was defeated in both the House and Senate.

Several features of the Senate bill were ruled out of order in the House and so never came to a vote there.

Uncle Sam has acquired, during the war, more than 34,000,000 acres of land. This makes the Federal Government the owner of some 383,000,000 acres of land, an area equal to 21 of the 26 States east of the Mississippi River.

The Byrd report lists Secretary of Interior Ickes as the land czar of the Government. More than 205,000,000 acres are under his control. The Department of Agriculture is next with 162,000,000 acres. Together these two departments control over 95 percent of all land owned by the Government.

Senator TRUMAN'S article in Collier's only served to accentuate the demand for action on the Pearl Harbor trials. But the administration still refuses to let the American people know the story. Those in the know insist that that story when told will rock the country.

Last December Congress extended the statute of limitations to June 7, 1944. Shortly before that time expired the House passed a resolution making it mandatory that courts martial be held within the next 3 months, or by September 7. But the administration, not wanting to let the American people have the story before the November elections, succeeded in getting the resolution changed, and extending the time to December 7, a month after election.

If Admiral Kimmel and General Short are guilty, they should be punished and relieved of the $6,000 a year that each draws as retired pay. If they are innocent, they should be exonerated, and the blame placed where it belongs.

Fifth Anniversary of War and Dastardly Attack on Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, today marks the fifth anniversary of the dastardly attack of the Germans upon peace-loving Poland and the beginning of the barbaric conflagration and slaughter that ultimately compelled us to get into the debacle in an effort to not only preserve ourselves but also the civilized world.

Though, according to the press reports, Poland was conquered after 3 or 4 weeks of heroic and stubborn fighting against overwhelming odds, her people, her soldiers still fight on in the various war theaters. Why only in this morning's papers we read that the Poles fighting in Italy have captured Pesaro. In the meantime, Hitler continues his butchery of women, children, and aged men. He has more than 150,000 of them in a concentration camp only a few miles outside of Warsaw and is subjecting them to the most fiendish and imaginable cruelties before merciful death meets them.

Not far to the east of Warsaw stands the mighty Russian Army, but for some unknown reason it has remained frozen in its tracks and has not made any advance in more than 3 weeks. Within the city of Warsaw and throughout Poland the Polish underground at insistence of Moscow and upon orders from the Polish Government in exile began its activity some 4 weeks ago. They have fought valiantly but their supplies are meager. They have made repeated pleas for aid but except for token supplies flown over from Italy by the English and Polish fliers, no substantial assistance has been delivered. Let us pray that the Russian Army will not remain inactive and passive until the remaining Poles in occupied Poland are annihilated before continuing their march on Berlin. A brave, courageous, and liberty-loving people who throughout their suffering have carried on should not be sacrificed upon the altar of politics.

In all decency, morality, and justice, Poland and the Polish people deserve a better fate.

Army-Navy Game

OF
HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the edict issued by the Honorable James V. Forrestal, Secretary of the Navy, banning the Army-Navy football game from public scrutiny amazes me. To me, and I know that I speak for millions of American sports-loving fans, the edict—as Whitney Martin, well-known sports columnist said—is "incongruous." It verges on the so-called hysteria that enveloped this Nation after Pearl Harbor. Then it might have been fully justified, or even in 1943, but certainly not now.

I have been 100 percent behind the war program, and we all recognize that although the road ahead is rough, victory will soon be with us. During the past two crucial years, the American sports public graciously accepted the order of the Army and Navy with respect to this great classic. Nevertheless it was perplexing for the public to understand why such a policy was required here in the United States when England, only a few miles from hostile air fields and hostile guns, has continued her sports schedule for the benefit of public crowds of 125,000 at single events. It seems a trifle on the "silly" side for the United States, practically out of the danger zone, to be so cautious in our sports program.

During the past three years, we know that the American people have performed a miraculous job of production. We have out-produced the world in planes, tanks, guns, shells, and in all implements of war. Morale has definitely been a great factor in attaining these production records. And in the interest of morale we need a good sports schedule. The British have set a good example. After five years of war, the British firmly believe that the morale value of sports in war time fully justifies their continuance and for the 1944–45 season the British Sports Coordinator has scheduled 65 athletic events that will attract approximately 3,000,000 people. A Gallup poll taken showed that the American people favor war-time sports; and that they favored the Army-Navy game to be played in a metropolitan city. Ninety-two percent of our boys in the armed forces favor war-time sports; they favor the Army-Navy game being played for the benefit of the general public.

However, after 3 years of effort, I am practically convinced that trying to change the edict of an "arm chair" strategist in Washington is more futile than batting one's head against a brick wall. The answers I get are "military expediency prohibits," "would impede the war effort," or "these limitations are imposed in accordance with wartime necessity for economy," or that "our principal desire is to avoid any unnecessary burden upon transportation facilities and to discourage nonessential use of gasoline and tires." These answers are plain hokum. The American people have accepted rationing and other restrictions willingly as a part of the war burden. But no American individual will be able to interpret Secretary Forrestal's reasons for again submerging the Army-Navy game. His reasons are more confusing than any of the multitude of O. P. A. or W. P. B. regulations. The Navy cannot go to Philadelphia or New York to play the Army, but the Navy can go to Cleveland to play Notre Dame before an expected 80,000. The Army cannot go to Philadelphia or New York to play the Navy, but it can go to New York to play Notre Dame before an anticipated 78,000. The drain on transportation facilities is listed as a drawback yet the Navy is scheduled to play as far south as Atlanta, Ga. This just does not make sense. The service teams are not permitted to play before crowds when they play each other but they are permitted to travel thousands of miles to play outside opposition in heavily populated centers.

Further, various rallies and drives are set up at considerable expense to the Treasury Department to sell more War bonds, and to help prevent inflation. Then when we have a natural, like the Army-Navy football game, which would account for the sale of a billion dollars' worth of bonds—and it could be sponsored by the United States Treasury Department—the military authorities put a damper on it. In addition, the failure to play this game before the general public will cost the taxpayers millions of dollars as the academies will be compelled to come to Congress to obtain appropriations to replenish their depleted funds.

Just as the fall of Paris was a vital morale builder to our men on the battle lines, the Army-Navy game would prove a great morale builder to the thousands of men on the production lines. We need the cooperation of both to win and to win quickly.

If the strategists at home or the powers that be insist on making a dud out of the Army-Navy game, why do they not call it off entirely? Either give the game back to the American people where it belongs, or quit giving phony excuses. Our sports-loving public catches on easily enough.

Millionaire Radicals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I have often wondered why a few of our wealthy people in the United States who have inherited large fortunes have turned radical and joined forces with the Communists and other un-American groups, and I believe I have found one of the answers in an article written by Dr. Dan W. Gilbert under the title of Millionaire Radicals, which I am inserting in the RECORD as a part of these remarks:

MILLIONAIRE RADICALS

(By Dr. Dan W. Gilbert)

It is a strange and interesting fact that the radical movement, aiming at the overthrow of our "capitalistic" system, has always attracted the support of certain men and women of wealth.

The most influential radical magazines and newspapers in America are largely subsidized by individuals who belong to the social class of the "idle rich." While it is paradoxical on the surface, the phenomenon of "capitalists" financing the anticapitalist agitators is, to a large degree, explained by the fact that nearly all of the "millionaire radicals" inherited their wealth.

Born to riches, unfamiliar with the work and sweat expended by their fathers or grandfathers to acquire their estate, ignorant of the means by which wealth is produced, unacquainted with the value of a dollar, it is perhaps only natural that some rich men's sons and daughters should ignorantly revolt against the capitalistic system.

Most young men inheriting wealth seek to use it for the benefit of mankind. They seek to carry on the businesses which their fathers created; they seek to manufacture improved goods for the consuming public, while maintaining good jobs for thousands of workers. They usually divert a large share of their excess wealth to the supporting of churches, schools, colleges, libraries, hospitals, research laboratories, and other agencies for the help of humanity.

But among the inheritors of great wealth there is always a minority of wastrels who delight in squandering money as a means of exhibitionism—of attracting attention to themselves, of making a show. Some of them squander their money on yachts, chorus girls, diamonds, race horses, etc. Others seek personal notoriety and ego-gratification by financing radical movements and radical propaganda, of which they are the heroes, under the guise of the uplift of the underprivileged. In either case, snobbery and self-glorification are the main motivation.

Behind almost every ambitious agitator who promises to turn the world upside down, there is a financial angel—a spoiled son or daughter of wealth, who, having tired of painting the town red, derives great emotional exhilaration from the prospect of painting the world red.

One son of wealth spends part of his inherited fortune financing "red" fronts and "red" propaganda organs; another has given over a million and a half dollars to the same purpose. A daughter of a wealthy Californian has for years been the angel of the Communist efforts toward revolution in the United States and is high in the leadership of the movement on the west coast; another has given nearly two millions of her accumulated fortune toward keeping a leftist weekly magazine afloat in the United States, although she has for some years resided in England. Still another daughter of wealth spends generously of her fortune in defense of troubled comrades and for bails and bonds when they get too red hot and become involved with the law. A former New Dealer bequeathed a fortune to build a foundation to perpetuate Marxism by propaganda and other means; a wealthy minister gave to the Communist Party a check for $350,000. A get-rich-quick Russian, made rich by sales of war chemicals in the First World War, has donated hundreds of thousands of dollars of his accumulated fortunes to the Communist revolution in the United States. A son of a Wall Street banker has devoted years of his life and much of his fortune to the "red" cause in the United States and to the interest of Russia; a hoodwinked Jewish individual in New York has been taken over for plenty by left-wingers who have led him actually to believe that Hitler's anti-Semitism is just around the corner in the United States. This money is, in turn, used to defeat conservatives in Congress and not for the intended purpose. These are but a few examples; many are available.

Karl Marx, the founder of modern communism, was subsidized in his literary and revolutionary activities by his ardent admirer, Frederick Engels also of Germany. Engels, and Marx, lived luxuriously off of Engels' inherited income from his father's investments in textile mills in England.

Marx called all workingmen "wage slaves." He contended that profits represent the robbery of the workers. Yet, all his life, he lived off the profits which Engels received from his father's estate.

Marx made a special issue of the condition of the textile workers of England. In fact, he wrote many articles on the subject of their so-called enslavement and exploitation. The same insincerity and hypocrisy are evident in the attitude and deeds of the modern well-to-do radicals.

Money comes and goes, easily and readily, in Hollywood. The millionaire movie stars do not always by earnest effort earn the fabulous salaries which they receive. A star may receive half a million dollars a year, not because of any special effort or excellence on her part (though many are real artists), but merely because nature gave her a beautiful face, a dimple, long eyelashes, platinum blonde hair, an attractive figure, or some other physical attribute.

As among the indolent sons and daughters of inherited wealth, squadermania is a raging plague among some of the millionaires of the movie colony. Some spendthrift stars invest heavily in yachts, mansions, jewelry, furs, and—as might be expected—the cause of radicalism, which offers a further unique outlet for their mania for notoriety and egogratification. Not all of the stars, by any means, have invested in radicalism; but a number of them have made an ostentatious pretense of devotion to the so-called "cause of the underprivileged."

Frequently, it is a rather transparent pretense. A well-known Hollywood commentator once told of attending a "benefit" staged by some of the radical stars during the course of the Spanish Civil War. The purpose was to raise funds for the so-called "oppressed Communists of Spain." In reality, it was a combination cocktail party and "radical benefit." After the consumption of what he estimated to be $600 worth of cocktails, a collection was taken—and a grand total of $32 was "raised" for the "oppressed Communists of Spain."

Hollywood's most notorious "millionaire radical"—who has remained in this country for a generation, but still refuses to become an American citizen—posed during the early phases of the war as a "champion" of a second front. In 1942 and 1943, when the Communists were demanding a second front, prematurely, against the advice of American and British military experts, he made a number of speeches demanding a second front in the "name of humanity." But, in Hollywood, this man is looked down upon because he has consistently refused to participate in entertainment programs for the boys in our army camps.

In obedience to the propaganda line of the Moscow leaders, he raised his voice on behalf of a premature second front, which probably would have cost needless casualties; but, he would not give of himself, of his own talents, to bring joy and entertainment to our soldiers in army camps.

Many of the political champions of the so-called underprivileged display the same strain of hypocrisy. One of the largest inheritors of wealth in American history has founded newspapers in two of our leading cities, which publicize him as a "great champion of the colored people." These papers, operated at considerable financial loss, are everlastingly whooping it up for greater opportunities for Negroes, and they are against almost everything that is, just to be different.

Other men of wealth, who never propagandized and publicized themselves as "champions of the Negro," have founded great schools and colleges in the South which have functioned in a practical way to give "greater opportunities for Negroes." A campaign of race hatred, which pretends to be waged in the interests of the colored people, can lead only to bloodshed and disaster for blacks and whites alike. The men who have extended real economic and educational opportunities to the colored people are not the ones who noisily and vaingloriously parade as "uplifters" and "champions" of the Negro race.

Many of the leaders of the most radical element of the New Deal are men of inherited wealth. Before the war the propagandist of class hatred loudly contended that one-third of our people are "ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-housed." The strange thing was that the scene of their "championing of the cause of the underprivileged" was, more than once, a $100-a-plate banquet in the Nation's most expensive hotel.

After stuffing themselves with a multicourse meal, consisting of fine and rare foods prepared into expensive dishes with unpronounceable foreign names, washed down with champagne or other expensive drinks, the "champions of the underprivileged" would rise and "view with alarm" the condition of their "millions of ill-fed countrymen." It seemed not to occur to them that, instead of proposing radical legislation, they might better and more sincerely help the poor and underfed by sharing with them some of their own inherited abundance including the food.

Certain churches have simple and sincere methods of helping the poor. Once a week all members of the church who habitually enjoy three square meals a day will deny themselves their main meal of the day. Then they will take the amount that the meal would ordinarily cost them and put it in a fund to buy food for the poor. If a man is used to paying $1 for this meal, he will miss the meal and put the $1 in the offering for the needy. Some politicians who are used to partaking of a $100-a-plate banquet might show greater sincerity and sympathy for the underprivileged by missing such a meal and putting the $100 in the offering plate of the Salvation Army or some other responsible agency for the relief of the real distressed.

While the millionaire radicals make a great display of self-righteously proclaiming their sympathy and solidarity with the underprivileged, the claim is usually hypocritical.

Nevertheless, many ordinary observers still find themselves puzzled to understand this form of behavior. They ask, "Why will a man of wealth finance a movement which would destroy all men of wealth, including himself, and at the same time the men of no wealth?"

There is a simple answer to this question. To find it, we need only survey the literature of the radical movement. The central point, emphasized by all Marxists, in the radical philosophy is that the revolution is inevitable. The future belongs to communism. The world of tomorrow will be controlled by the radicals.

Once a rich man becomes convinced that this is true, he becomes frightened. The revolution is coming, surely and inevitably; that means the liquidation of all capitalists. Anxious to save himself, he joins the radical movement; he pours his money into it, in return for the assurance, expressed or implied, that by becoming a fellow-traveler of the radicals he will save himself from the condemnation and liquidation which will be visited upon the enemy capitalist class when the revolution comes.

It was by playing upon the fears of the wealthy that the radical National Socialist Party of Germany, led by Adolph Hitler, was able to secure the support of certain wealthy industrialists. The Nazi propagandists sold these gullible businessmen on the idea that nothing could stop the Hitler drive for power. Get on the bandwagon and you will not be ground to death beneath its wheels was the come-on invitation which they made to men of financial power and influence.

Of course, after he got power, Hitler turned upon the men who financed his movement, imprisoning or exiling them and confiscating their properties. Vainly they had sought to purchase personal safety and immunity from the radical terror.

More often than not, when rich men finance the radical cause, it is because of cowardice and desire to save themselves, rather than any love of country or for the downtrodden whom the radicals pretend to champion.

The American constitutional (capitalistic) system provides for liberty and justice for all. True patriots, rich and poor, will be devoted to upholding and protecting that system.

There should be no double standard. When a poor man enlists in the radical cause, people will sometimes say, "He is just greedy and envious of those who have more than he has." But when a rich man enlists in the radical cause, there are some who are deceived by the pretension that he is guided by pure and humanitarian motives of concern for the underprivileged.

The fact is that any person, rich or poor, who seeks to tear down the temple of American liberty and equality is actuated either by ignorance, cowardice, or unworthy selfish motives.

Radicalism is a disease of the mind or heart, or both. Men and women of wealth, whose minds are clear, consciences are clean, and hearts are pure, find other means of helping the underprivileged than by aspiring to be "big shots" and synthetic heroes of a movement which would reduce all their fellow citizens, rich and poor alike, to the level of sovietized or nazified slaves of a radical regime founded on terror and dictatorship.

Butter Is Still Butter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALT HORAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, the Grange has been the outstanding national farm organization in the legislative protection of the farmers of America. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the National Grange is the only national farm organization that has appeared before the House and the Senate Agriculture Committees in support of the dairymen of our Nation this session. Here is a farm organization that works quietly along for the interest of the farm people of the Nation. It does not get off the reservation and become a tail end of any political party. It is an organization that is for the farmers first, last, and always.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT OF FRED BRENCKMAN, WASHINGTON REPRESENTATIVE OF THE NATIONAL GRANGE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. BRENCKMAN. Mr. Chairman, my name is Fred Brenckman. I am the Washington representative of the National Grange and our offices are located at 1344 F Street NW.

This bill proposes the repeal of the Federal tax of 10 cents a pound on yellow oleomargarine, together with certain other taxes that are levied under existing law against wholesalers and retailers of oleomargarine.

The National Grange is opposed to any legislation of this character. Just because we are at war, and because there is a temporary shortage of butter, is not any reason why we should repeal much of the legislation in this connection that has been enacted during more than half a century.

Early in its career, the Grange directed its energies and efforts toward securing the enactment of legislation in State and Nation to suppress fraud and deception in the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine made in semblance of butter. The first Federal regulatory measure regarding this matter was passed in 1886, followed by the Grout Act of 1902.

This legislation worked satisfactorily for many years with the Federal Government collecting a tax of one-fourth cent per pound on the sale of oleomargarine in its natural color, which is white. A tax of 10 cents per pound has been levied on the product when colored in imitation of butter. This is intended to protect the dairy industry against dishonest competition and the consumer against fraud.

In November 1936 the then Commissioner of Internal Revenue issued a ruling under which oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter by the use of palm oil, chemically treated to make it yellow, was permitted to escape with a tax of one-fourth cent per pound, instead of 10 cents. The ruling rested on the technicality that palm oil was a natural product and that its use was permissible without the payment of the additional tax. This ruling caused the price of butter in the New York market to drop from 45 to 25 cents per pound. Prices of other dairy products registered a correspondingly sharp decline.

As soon as this ruling was made, there was a perfect rash of oleomargarine advertising in streetcars, newspapers, and magazines all over the country, because the oleomargarine interests naturally reasoned that if they could sell yellow oleomargarine with a tax of only one-fourth cent per pound, they could do a very profitable business. As an example of the money that was spent in this advertising campaign, on January 10, 1931, the Saturday Evening Post carried a double-page advertisement in colors, inserted by one of the leading oleo manufacturers of Chicago, which made it appear that oleo was just as good as butter, and which was well calculated to make a strong appeal to the thrifty housewife.

The advertisement pictured many tempting dishes, all of which depended on the generous use of oleomargarine. We were reliably informed that this advertisement cost more than $23,000. No one ever heard of butter being advertised at such a lavish outlay. The reason for this is simple. There is not enough profit in making butter to warrant such an expenditure for advertising. In normal times it costs about 10 cents to make a pound of oleomargarine. There never was a time from the days of flintlock rifles and wooden moldboards down to the present when it was possible to make a pound of genuine butter for 10 cents and live.

After a fruitless attempt to induce the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to rescind this ruling, the Grange joined with other farm groups in demanding corrective legislation. After a memorable battle extending over the whole of the short session of Congress ending on March 4, 1931, the Brigham-Townsend Oleomargarine Act was passed. This calls for the use of the Lovibond tintometer test in differentiating between white and yellow oleomargarine, entirely eliminating all grounds for argument regarding the coloring matter used in yellow oleomargarine. The passage of this legislation corrected a situation which was costing the dairy farmers of the country approximately $1,000,000 a day in the form of lower prices.

My home State of Pennsylvania uses the tintometer test and yellow oleomargarine cannot be sold in Pennsylvania.

Some producers of cottonseed oil have long entertained the idea that our oleomargarine laws have worked to their disadvantage, the theory being that without any regulation of the manufacture of oleomargarine, or any taxation, a larger market would be afforded for cottonseed oil. This, of course, overlooks the fact that the dairy industry is one of the best customers of the producers of cottonseed products. Whatever injures the dairy industry also injures the cottonseed-oil industry. Moreover, there can be no permanent agriculture without animal husbandry. The destruction of our dairy industry would break the immemorial rhythm of nature: Up from the soil, and back to the soil.

Notwithstanding all the talk about the improved nutritive value of oleomargarine, Canada prohibits the manufacture, importation, or sale of oleomargarine, butterine, or other substitutes for butter. The Dominion Department of Agriculture declares that there is little likelihood of any change in this legislation, notwithstanding the war emergency. With imports of foreign oils and fats practically shut off by the war, domestic producers are finding a ready market for their products at ceiling prices. Under the circumstances, there appears to be no justification whatever for such legislation as is proposed in S. 1744.

After the war, we will be flooded by imports of cheap foreign oils. It is conceivable that Congress, animated by a generous desire to rehabilitate the Philippines, will admit coconut oil free of duty. The manufacturers of oleomargarine may be depended upon to use the cheapest oil they can get. That will be coconut oil and not cottonseed oil.

In view of these considerations, we think the producers of cottonseed oil and soybean oil would be working against their own best interest in trying to pass such legislation as is embodied in S. 1744.

In saying that, Mr. Chairman, I want to make it entirely clear that I personally have the highest regard for Senator SMITH, the author of this bill. And that goes for the National Grange as well.

Senator ELLENDER. Are there any questions by the committee?

Thank you very much, Mr. Brenckman.

Statement on Oleo Made by Mrs. Sam A. Rask, of Minnesota, State Agricultural Chairman, Federation of Women's Clubs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. CARL ANDERSEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, the following testimony of Mrs. Rask in opposition to oleo should be of particular interest to every housewife in America:

STATEMENT OF MRS. SAM A. RASK, STEELE COUNTY, MINN., STATE AGRICULTURAL CHAIRMAN, MINNESOTA FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS

Mrs. RASK. My name is Mrs. Sam A. Rask, and I live in Steele County, Minn. I am State agricultural chairman of the Minnesota Federation of Women's Clubs.

Senator ELLENDER. Will you describe that, tell us what it is, its membership and so forth.

Mrs. RASK. Yes, sir. I live in Steele County, Minn. This small county, comprising only 12 congressional townships, has 22 large farmers' cooperative creameries producing annually more than 6,000,000 pounds of butter. We call it the butter capital of the world. The State of Minnesota produces annually over 300,000,000 pounds of butter.

I am the State agricultural chairman of the Minnesota Federation of Women's Clubs, and I have been State president of that organization and a director of the General Federation of Women's Clubs with headquarters in Washington, D. C.

Senator ELLENDER. What is the membership of that agricultural committee of the Minnesota Federation of Women's Clubs? What is the membership and how do you maintain yourselves?

Mrs. RASK. We are a committee appointed by the State president of the Minnesota Federation of Women's Clubs. The Minnesota Federation of Women's Clubs has over 40,000 members. The president appoints the chairman and we work very frequently under direction from the national chairman. We also use our own individual ideas.

Senator ELLENDER. You maintain yourself from funds that you collect from your own memberships, I presume?

Mrs. RASK. Yes; from the dues. Whatever expenses are incurred are paid by our dues.

In appearing here today to oppose the passage of this bill, S. 1744, may I say at the outset that my statements are based on no little familiarity with the dairy business. I was born and grew to girlhood on a dairy farm in Wisconsin. My father sold milk to families living in a city of considerable size, and usually delivered that milk himself to his customers. Many times, when help was not so plentiful, I drove the milk cart to town myself, or accompanied the hired man, if we had one—to make deliveries and collect accounts. I know from experience what it means to the dairy farmers in long hours and endless days, 7 days in the week and 52 weeks in the year. There is not a 40-hour week for them, with time and a half for overtime. I know from experience the meager returns received for their effort in the days before the dairy business began to come into its own. In fact, it was not until some time after the first national legislation was enacted to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine that the dairy farmer began to receive a fair return for his labor. And now, Mr. Chairman, it is proposed to repeal legislation which has been on our national statute books for 57 years, and put our dairy farmer back to where he was in the early days of this century.

In all my years of married life I have lived in a typical American village in a dairy community. My husband has owned and operated dairy farms, and has dealt with dairy farmers all his life, except for the time he served our country during the Spanish-American War. In fact, our living and our very existence and prosperity has always been dependent upon, and has been coexistent with that type of farming. The success and prosperity of these farmers meant our success and prosperity, and only to the same extent as that enjoyed by these farmers.

Agriculture is the most basic of all occupations. We depend upon it for most of our food, our clothing, and a large part of our industrial raw materials. Two-thirds of the wealth added each year to our national resources spring from agricultural production. And one-sixth of the entire agricultural income of the farmers of these United States comes from dairy products.

In 1940 the purchasing power of American agriculture was only $161 per capita, as compared with $700 per person for those not living on farms. Anything which adversely affects the income of the farmer is reflected at once in a lessened income for us all. History shows that the national income increases in the ratio of approximately 8 to 1 with the total income from agriculture.

There are in this country approximately 35,000,000 people living on the land—on farms; and 25,000,000 people living in the villages and rural cities of our country. All of these people, approximately 60,000,000 people, are entirely dependent upon the income from the farms in their respective communities for their living, and a little to be saved for old age and a rainy day. When the farmers prosper, the people in these villages and rural cities prosper; and when the farmer's returns for his labor are only sufficient to pay for operation costs and living expenses there is not much left for the people in these villages and rural cities.

The entire purchasing power of the 60,000,000 people who are dependent upon the prosperity of farming is the outstanding factor in our so-called business life. The farmer draws from the soil and creates new wealth every year, which eventually finds it way into channels of trade and commerce.

At this point it might well be asked: "Why are the members of the women's clubs in the cities and villages so interested in this legislation? They are consumers; are they not? If all restrictive legislation were removed from the manufacture and sale of colored oleomargarine would not that tend to lower the price of butter which we women buy?"

That probably is just about what would happen, Mr. Chairman, and is one of the main reasons why we oppose this bill. Outside of the ore taken from our iron mines, and the returns from which support only a very small portion of our population, farming produces the great bulk of new wealth in our State. Most of the 40,000 members of our Minnesota Federation of Women's Clubs live in the villages and rural cities. They are a part of those farming communities. Whatsoever affects our farmers also affects us.

I would like to say right there that, just like cotton used to be the chief topic of conversation in the South, dairying today is a chief topic of conversation in Minnesota. That's true in the cities and towns as well as on the farms. That's because dairying is so important to all people, even in the large cities of our State. We have large cities, and the economic welfare of these, too, are dependent largely on the economic welfare of our Minnesota and Northwest dairy farmers.

Manufacturers of oleomargarine — and there are only a handful of them—seem to be set on using the wartime emergency as a means of repealing regulatory legislation with respect to oleomargarine that is not prohibitive of its use, but is an insurance against fraud and substitution and a protection to the consumer. From the standpoint of dairymen, there is no desire to prohibit the sale of oleomargarine, but they demand that it shall be sold for what it is. And we are definitely opposed to its sale, merchandising, and advertising it as an imitation of butter.

If, as it has been contended, it is a food for the low-income groups, then certainly these groups should by all means be protected against any possible substitution of oleomargarine for butter. Most of these supposed low-income groups are today in the high-wage-earning class and certainly are privileged to buy food of their own selection and, regardless of their income, be afforded protection that is given them through the very limited tax and license regulations that are now in effect.

An attempt has been made in the past to claim that this is a question of the southern cotton farmer versus the American dairy farmer and purely on a basis of their economic welfare.

From this standpoint, it should be recognized that if the dairy farmer were not in a position to purchase for his dairy cattle the cottonseed meal produced by the cotton farmer, the cottonseed producer would be the loser, for at no time would he receive sufficient additional income from the sale of the oil to compensate him for the loss in price on the sale of his cottonseed meal. This is not a question of the cotton farmer against the dairy farmer. It is wholly and simply a question of the large oleomargarine manufacturers trying to gain a favored position that would be of special benefit to them at the expense of both the producer and the consumer.

Now, why are these manufacturers of oleomargarine so determined to do everything in their power to repeal the present Federal law? Why are they striving so desperately hard to so disguise their product that no difference between it and butter can be detected by the consumer? What other possible reason than a wish for more profits by misleading the public through this continual insistence that their product be permitted to be sold looking like, tasting like, and smelling like butter?

If we are not right in our assumption, then why is it so imperative that oleomargarine be permitted to be colored yellow—the traditional color of butter? Since this legislation has been urged as a war measure, why not color oleomargarine red, white, and blue? The addition of coloring matter does not in the slightest degree increase its nutritive value. It is beyond the question of a doubt that should this bill be enacted into law we would find oleomargarine produced and sold in butter cartons within 60 days after its passage.

If oleomargarine is allowed to be sold in imitation of butter it will result in widespread distress to our farmers. Let olemargarine be sold for just what it is, without masquerading as a dairy product. The addition of artifical color to olemargarine causes the product to resemble butter. Colored oleomargarine could, therefore, be easily substituted for butter by the retailer and by the restaurants and other eating places. Should we now remove the present restrictions on the sale of colored margarine, we are opening wide the gates of deceptive and fraudulent practices. The fact that the manufacturers of oleomargarine wish to copy coloring, flavor, texture, and chemical properties of butter makes it evident that it is their purpose to attempt to market their product as a substitute for butter and, ultimately, to supplant butter with oleomargarine.

Summing it all up, all that we ask is that oleomargarine be sold for exactly what it is; that it be prohibited from using the color associated with butter since the beginning of time; the oleomargarine contains no dairy products; and that no material be added that will make it smell, taste, or look like butter.

Beyond that, the manufacturers may go the limit.

I have here a reprint from an article—found in the St. Paul Pioneer Press, and I would like to read a part of it. This was published last November.

"At the Fort Worth convention of the General Federation of Womens Clubs in 1942 a resolution endorsing oleomargarine was defeated. The proponents of this resolution claimed that competent authorities had gone on record for oleomargarine, as set out in the following article by Dick Wilcox, which appeared in the St. Paul Pioneer Press recently."

That was last October.

"There have been an avalanche of propaganda recently favoring oleomargarine over butter. Dairymen claim that there has been a concerted effort to expand and circulate this propaganda at the expense of the dairy industry.

"Doubtful experiments at the Minnesota College, showing that there was no substitute for butter as a good-health producer were published and widely circulated. Similar results were obtained in experiments at Wisconsin and other universities.

"Before Russia asked for food from the United States under lend-lease, it experimented with different steps as soldier diet, using butter, oleomargarine, and fortified with vitamins, and oleomargarine fortified. It was found that when the soldiers fed on butter were wounded, they recovered much more quickly than those fed with substitutes."

I thank you, gentlemen.

Senator ELLENDER. Thank you very much, Mrs. Rask.

Dr. Harrison A. Ruehe, Executive Secretary of the American Butter Institute, Makes a Statement on Oleo Before the Senate Agricultural Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. ANTON J. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I have known Dr. H. A. Ruehe 20 years. He knows whereof he speaks. I recommend that all who wish a keener insight into the problems that are confronting the dairy industry read the following testimony given before a committee of the Senate:

STATEMENT OF DR. HARRISON A. RUEHE, EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, AMERICAN BUTTER INSTITUTE, CHICAGO, ILL.

Dr. RUEHE. My name is Harrison A. Ruehe. At the present time I am executive secretary of the American Butter Institute. Qualifying myself, may I report that I was graduated from the College of Agriculture, University of Illinois, in 1911; received the master degree from the University of Illinois in dairy husbandry in 1916, and the degree of doctor of philosophy from Cornell University in 1921. I joined the staff of the University of Illinois in 1912 as an instructor, and at the present time am on leave of absence from the University of Illinois and acting as secretary of the American Butter Institute.

Senator ELLENDER. What is the American Butter Institute?

Dr. RUEHE. American Butter Institute is a trade association of some 500 members scattered throughout the United States.

Senator ELLENDER. How is it maintained?

Dr. RUEHE. It is maintained by dues from the various members.

Senator ELLENDER. Do you obtain any dues other than those collected from your membership?

Dr. RUEHE. That is all. It is based on their production.

Senator ELLENDER. You say you have a membership of 500?

Dr. RUEHE. Approximately 500 plants.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, what percentage is that of the entire number of plants in the country, do you know?

Dr. RUEHE. Well, there are some 3,000 creameries in the United States, but our membership manufacture about one-third of the butter produced, and they merchandise some butter in addition to that, so I would assume that they merchandise approximately a little over one-half of the butter manufactured in the United States; that is, creamery butter.

Senator ELLENDER. You may proceed with your statement.

Dr. RUEHE. The American Butter Institute, a trade association representing more than 500 commercial creameries scattered throughout the United States, opposes the passage of the Smith bill, S. 1744. It is the opinion of the American Butter Institute that the passage of this bill will eliminate the present 10 cents per pound tax on colored oleomargarine and permit wholesale and retail dealers to color oleomargarine yellow without paying a license fee. The removal of this 10-cent tax is retrogression in legislation in the production and control of a food product which is manufactured as a substitute for butter. Removing this tax will open the door to the fraudulent practices of selling an imitation product to the unsuspecting public as the wholesome dairy product, butter.

It should be pointed out clearly that the reputable oleomargarine manufacturers are honest and their integrity is not questioned. Even though the product were not taxed, the reputable manufacturers would not stoop to fraudulent practices, but fraud will develop in the distribution of this product.

It is only necessary to go back to the era when oleomargarine was not taxed to discern the malpractices which would develop. Previous to 1886, when oleomargarine was not taxed, the practice of selling oleomargarine colored to imitate butter ran rampant in many areas where food-control measures were lax, and in most instances consumers in lower-income brackets were most greatly imposed upon.

In 1886 a 2-cent tax was placed upon colored oleomargarine, but experience shows clearly that the 2-cent tax on colored oleomargarine was not sufficient to discourage fraud and the malpractice of selling oleomargarine colored as butter continued. The Federal authorities found it necessary to increase this tax on colored oleomargarine to 10 cents per pound in order to properly control the merchandising of this product and to discourage fraudulent practices. Even with the 10-cent tax, considerable time was required to thoroughly enforce its provisions. I remember as a small boy I visited the neighborhood grocer—King Kelly—and caught him coloring oleomargarine which he sold to his trade as butter, and this neighborhood was in the lower income bracket class.

Should the acts of Congress which created these protective measures be eliminated or modified so as to eliminate the 10-cent tax on colored oleomargarine, there is no question but that those who have a thorough disregard for law and the rights of other people would turn to the fraudulent practice of merchandising colored oleomargarine as butter. It is possible that this activity might destroy both the reputable butter and oleomargarine industries.

Provisions are now made for the licensing of the manufacture of oleomargarine and for the taxing of uncolored oleomargarine to the extent of one-quarter of a cent per pound and colored oleomargarine at 10 cents a pound. The one-quarter cent tax is not a prohibitive one; it merely provides a method by which the production and sale of this commodity can be checked from its source of production to the purchase by the ultimate consumer, thus safeguarding the public. The addition of coloring matter to oleomargarine does not increase nor improve its food value. It merely makes it possible for the product to appear as something which it is not—butter.

The natural color of butter is golden yellow. The degree of intensity of this color varies somewhat with the breed of cattle which produces the butterfat and the feeds which the cattle consume, but yellow is nature's color of this product. There is a correlation between the intensity of the yellow color of butter and the carotin content, and carotin is the precursor of vitamin A. It is one of nature's sources of this essential vitamin.

The chief sources of the raw materials for oleomargarine are various vegetable oils. These products are liquid fats at normal room temperatures, and consequently it is necessary for them to be subjected to hydrogenation in order to change their chemical composition so that they will have a melting point simulating that of normal butterfat. It must be pointed out, however, that these hydrogenated vegetable oils are not and cannot be made chemically identical to the natural fats existing in butterfat. They consist primarily of what the chemist terms "long chain fatty acids" and hydrogenating does not in any way shorten the chains of their molecular structure. The natural color of these hydrogenated oils is white or an off-white color. Butterfat is composed of glycerides of a number of fatty acids, an appreciable amount of which are short chain fatty acids. Milk fat is the only natural fat which contains these short chain fatty acids, but they do appear in the milk fat of milk of various animal species including the human. This is singular. Undoubtedly the great Creator, in His wisdom, had a justifiable reason for having such short chain fatty acids present in the fat which He created for the nourishment of the young of the species, which the chemist has failed to determine with his present knowledge and ability. The great Creator has performed many miracles which chemists and other scientists have spent lifetimes of service trying to understand. Undoubtedly the necessity of short chain fatty acids in the diet of the infant is one of these which, up to the present time, remains unsolved by the scientist.

During recent years oleomargarine manufacturers have been fortifying oleomargarine with synthetic vitamin A, and it is claimed by some that 9,000 units of synthetic vitamin A per pound of oleomargarine are equal nutritionally to the vitamin A content of a pound of butter produced during winter months.

It is true that the vitamin A content of butter produced in winter is lower than that of summer-produced butter, but much of it contains more than 9,000 units of vitamin A per pound even in the winter, and at least twice that amount during other parts of the year.

It must be realized that up to the present time no scientist has proved that 9,000 units of synthetic vitamin A in a pound of oleomargarine are nutritionally equivalent to 9,000 or more units of natural vitamin A in winter-produced butter when these products are included in the diet of human beings.

Such claims are based primarily upon experimental work carried on with experimental animals. Everyone realizes that 6 months or a year in the life of a laboratory animal—the white rat, for instance—is vastly different from the span of life of a human being, and there is no evidence that oleomargarine fortified with synthetic vitamin A, fed to a human being from infancy to senility will be equivalent to the feeding of equivalent amounts of natural butter through the same span of life.

There is no evidence to prove that the potency of synthetic vitamin A in oleomargarine is retained in that product from the time of its manufacture to the ultimate consumption to the same degree that the potency of natural vitamin A is retained in natural butter Consequently, there is a question as to the validity of the claims of many, including some scientists. The veracity of their statements that synthetically fortified oleomargarine is nutritionally equivalent to butter has not been proved in human diets.

During the last two or more decades, from 35 to 40 percent of the milk produced in these United States has been marketed in the form of butter. Butter is the balance wheel for the dairy industry. In fact, it is the balance wheel for a large portion of the agriculture of this country. It has been a factor in improving the productivity of the soils of this and other countries. It is now serving in this capacity throughout many States, including Southern States.

The removal of the controlling tax on colored oleomargarine opens the doorway for fraud. It goes further—it opens the doorway for the destruction of the market for from 35 to 40 percent of the milk produced in this country. If this tremendous market is destroyed, it means a vast curtailment in the dairy-cattle population of this country.

This would be serious if considered only from the standpoint of dairy products, but the seriousness becomes multiplied when we realize that dairy cattle furnish a large portion of the supply of veal and beef in this country, as well as hides for leather and hair for various commercial uses. Such an elimination of essentials would be catastrophic, but this is even more far reaching. Dairy cattle supply an extremely important market for the byproducts—soybean, linseed, and cottonseed meals, as well as other crops which are important items in the agricultural production program of this country.

It is realized that at certain times cottonseed oil is used as the basis for oleomargarine, and other times soybean oil or linseed oil or a mixture of these are the products used in the manufacture of the hydrogenated fats for oleomargarine. However, these are not the only sources for the raw oils, as history points out that copra fat and the oils from various nuts may serve as the basic ingredients for vegetable oleomargarine. It should be pointed out that the sources of materials for the manufacture of oleomargarine are selected on the basis of their cost and availability—that is, economic rather than nutritional factors are considered.

From newspaper comments, it is evident that certain phases of agriculture having been misled into thinking that the elimination of the 10-cent tax on oleomargarine would greatly improve the market for the oils from the seeds of certain crops. This has been especially true in the case of soybeans. It should be pointed out clearly that if a large portion of the market for the means of these seeds was destroyed by the elimination of 25 or 30 percent of our dairy cattle, the growers of these crops would be in a dilemma. On might go further and state that soybeans and other fat-producing seed crops are soil-depleting crops, and consequently, to maintain fertility and productivity of our soils, certain chemical elements—especially nitrogen, phosphorus, and potassium—must be returned to the soil. Experience has proved that feeding these seed meals to dairy cattle and returning the manure to the land is not only one of the most economical methods for maintaining soil fertility but it is also one of the most satisfactory. Consequently, the elimination of 25 or 30 percent of the dairy-cattle population of this country because of the destruction of the market for butter would undoubtedly raise a grave question concerning the maintenance of the fertility of the land, which is basic to the supply of human food for the population of this country and our lend-lease neighbors.

It might be well to interject here the thought that there may be a change in our scheme of tariffs in order to carry out a good-neighbor policy, and whereas we may now think that the source of materials for oleomargarine will always come from crops grown within the United States, we must not lose sight of the fact that a few changes in tariffs may eliminate a large part of the market for cottonseed oil, linseed oil, and soybean oil produced in this country, and open the door for vegetable and nut oils produced by our neighbor countries, especially tropical and semitropical areas.

On October 13, 1943, in speaking before the Minnesota Creamery Operators and Managers Association in St. Paul, Dr. T. G. Stitts, Chief of the Dairy and Poultry Branch of the Food Distribution Administration, made the following statement:

"Butter is one of the most talked-of things in the country today. It affects more people more intimately than almost any other war or civilian commodity. That's why butter production in Minnesota makes not only the St. Paul and New York papers, but the Moscow papers as well."

From this statement, it seems clear that the Food Distribution Administration realizes the importance of butter, not only from the standpoint of its nutritional value, but also because of its morale-building importance. The results of a W. P. B. consumer study showed butter as the article most sorely missed by consumers among the rationed commodities.

Any legislation which would let down the bars for the destruction of the market for this important commodity and thus discourage its production, would be sabotage to the war effort and to the agricultural industry of this country. It is only necessary to look back to a few months ago when some camps were unable to supply the soldiers stationed there with an adequate supply of butter, in order to get a slight appreciation of dejected morale caused by a lack of butter.

Great demands are being placed on the dairy industry for dairy products to meet the requirements of our armed forces, allies, and civilian consumers. It is only necessary to compare butter production for 1943 with butter production for 1942 and the production so far in 1944 to that of 1943 to realize that there is a gradual decrease in the supply of this commodity. Any legislation which would in the slightest degree give butterfat producers the thought that butter was to be faced with the unfair competition of a substitute product, would undoubtedly have a demoralizing effect which would result in an immediate decrease in the production of milk and butterfat.

The American Butter Institute protests legislation which would remove the 10-cent tax on yellow-colored oleomargarine and thus open the gateway for the fraudulent marketing of a substitute product as butter, and protests the consideration of legislation which would have a discouraging and demoralizing effect upon the dairy farmers of these United States, the result of which could be a reduction in the basic food commodities which are greatly needed, and especially during the war emergency.

The effort of the American Butter Institute is not directed toward eliminating or hindering the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, but rather we are in agreement with the opinion of some of the officials of some of the oleomargarine manufacturers that the product—oleomargarine—should be sold for what it is and on its own merits, and not in semblance of butter.

Senator ELLENDER. Dr. Ruehe, will you tell the committee how you come to the conclusion that the removal of the tax will tend to promote fraud?

Dr. RUEHE. For the simple reason that at the present time you have this 10-cent tax control, which makes it hurt when they disobey, and there is less tendency for it.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, could you not make it more effective by penalizing a manufacturer or a wholesaler or a retailer for selling a product that is not what it is represented to be?

Dr. RUEHE. Well, it is a little harder, unless you have a definite tax, to follow through all the channels of trade, I think.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, I was in hopes that some way could be worked out whereby the element of fraud could be eliminated, because that seems to be the only contention, or one of the main contentions.

Dr. RUEHE. Well, history shows that they were not able to do it with the 2-cent tax, were not able to control it, and, as a matter of fact, I think at the present time they are having difficulty in controlling it, even with the 10-cent tax.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, you suggested that a retailer could easily substitute in a carton margarine for butter. In that case, do you not think that might be eliminated by forcing the margarine manufacturers to pack their product in a certain shaped container?

Dr. RUEHE. No; because, take the kitchen of a restaurant, the consumer never sees the container.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, could we not force the restaurant man to have a sign in his restaurant saying that the product served here is margarine, if he does serve that?

Dr. RUEHE. Yes; they have that now.

Senator ELLENDER. I see. In other words, what I was trying to get from you, if you have any views on it, is as to whether or not we could write into the law such strong provisions that would eliminate the fraud element.

Dr. RUEHE. There is nothing that hurts worse than to pinch a person's pocketbook one way or another, and I personally have no suggestion as to a simpler manner than the tax.

Senator ELLENDER. You think it is justifiable to put a tax on a——

Dr. RUEHE. Because the coloring does nothing so far as improving the nutritional quality—it is purely a matter of disguise.

Senator ELLENDER. But there is evidence here to the effect that you color butter 9 months out of the year, and the material used to color butter is the same as that used to color margarine. What have you to say about that?

Dr. RUEHE. That varies a lot. I learned the butter-making trade. Really 4 months of the year we have to add some color.

Senator ELLENDER. There is evidence to that effect.

Dr. RUEHE. It depends entirely upon your cows, what the cows are getting. Sometimes the butter is too yellow, even with natural color.

Senator ELLENDER. What difference is there, then, in that process? In one instance you make it legal to color and the other you make it illegal.

Dr. RUEHE. But yellow is the natural color of butter.

Senator ELLENDER. Now, we also had some evidence here this morning that oleomargarine that is made entirely from soybean oil has a yellow color, and to look at it, it is about the same color, to me, as butter. Now, if the color can be obtained from a natural product, would the objection be as great, as far as you are concerned, as it is now to using this artificial color?

Dr. RUEHE. I question if they can always get the same intensity of color. There are a number of technical problems. I am not an authority on margarine, but I have worked with fats, and in the natural purification process of getting these oils so they are really, from the standpoint of flavor, acceptable to the public, in purifying these oils they do discolor them by certain filtration processes. I know a number of years ago our own experiment station was trying to develop some cooking oils with soybean oil. I was called in to pass on some of the products cooked, one of which was doughnuts, cooked in that soybean oil. The soybean oil was oxidized with trimethylene, and those doughnuts tasted like they had been fried in fish oil. So there are certain purifying processes these oils have to go through to make them suitable in flavor, and I imagine much of that color is taken out. In other words, you might have a soybean oil that looked yellow, but whether it would make satisfactory margarine is a question. I think the oleomargarine people make the statement that they have difficulty in maintaining the flavor of margarine if an appreciable amount of soybean oil is used.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, of course, there has been considerable progress made in the manufacture of margarine from the early eighties up to the present time.

Dr. RUEHE. Because they have hydrogenated it. That has been developed.

Senator ELLENDER. I notice in your statement that one of your many objections was that margarine was made from oils that came from off shore, or something to that effect.

Dr. RUEHE. It might open the door for those oils if our tariff system was changed.

Senator ELLENDER. Would you have a different attitude as to this bill if it was written therein that the tax now imposed shall be applied only as to those margarines that are made from oils that are imported to this country?

Dr. RUEHE. I would be opposed to it whether that was in it or not.

Senator ELLENDER. In other words, whether——

Dr. RUEHE. That would be purely a tariff proposition you are speaking of.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, what I had in mind was this: Here you have a product that is made from beans and nuts, and so forth that are produced in this country, and I am wondering if there would be any objection, providing, of course, that the elements of fraud would be thoroughly circumscribed so there would not be any chance, or little chance, of fraud, as to whether or not, if margarine is made entirely out of American products, grown in this country, you would object.

Dr. RUEHE. I would still object to having it in.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, your objection is based a good deal from a commercial standpoint; is it not?

Dr. RUEHE. Both——

Senator ELLENDER. I mean, your feeling is that if margarine is permitted to be produced in large quantities, that it might in some measure curtail the production of butter?

Dr. RUEHE. That is right. Then again, I do not know—no experiments have been carried over a long enough time. I mean, we do these things with rats, and a rat 3 or 4 years old is an old man.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, Dr. Ruehe, we have used rats to determine a lot of things that have been very helpful to the human race.

Dr. RUEHE. Yes, indeed, but sometimes it is difficult to make the proper transition from the life of the rat to the life of the human.

Senator ELLENDER. We had a very eminent authority, in fact, I consider him so—it took him about 15 minutes to tell us about all the degrees he has, and the work he has done for the past 40 or 50 years—and he stated, as I recall it, that since vitamin A was added to oleomargarine that nutritionally it was just as good as butter. Of course, you differ with that?

Dr. RUEHE. Well, I would question that statement, because I do not believe there is any evidence that has proved that feeding fortified oleomargarine through the life span of a human—not a rat, but a human—shows it is nutritionally equivalent.

Senator ELLENDER. Of course he countered that——

Dr. RUEHE. In other words, the rat may have lived, but a lot of these difficulties do not come up in 6 months or a year. We do not know. There is a possibility of getting too many vitamins. We do not know that.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, he countered that by saying that many human beings have lived to maturity in cases where very little milk or butter was available to them.

Dr. RUEHE. Yes.

Senator ELLENDER. Thank you very much. Any questions?

Senator AIKEN. Yes. You represent the American Butter Institute, Dr. Ruehe?

Dr. RUEHE. Yes.

Senator AIKEN. What is the American Butter Institute?

Dr. RUEHE. It is a trade association of about 500 members.

Senator AIKEN. Butter manufacturers?

Dr. RUEHE. Butter manufacturers. And we manufacture about a third—the membership manufacture about a third of the creamery butter in the United States, and merchandise about a half—a little over a half.

Senator AIKEN. Swift & Co. are a member?

Dr. RUEHE. Yes.

Senator AIKEN. Armour?

Dr. RUEHE. Armour.

Senator AIKEN. Wilson Packing Co.?

Dr. RUEHE. Yes.

Senator AIKEN. Does it strike you as being peculiar, Mr. Chairman, that Swift, Armour, and Wilson are 3 of the 18 members of the Oleomargarine Association, and Mr. Hopkins appears here in support of this bill on behalf of Swift, Armour, and Wilson, and Dr. Ruehe comes here opposing it on behalf of the same people, and I wonder from that which side Swift, Armour, and Wilson are on.

Senator ELLENDER. No; I would not say that. I imagine that a lot of the members of this association distribute oleomargarine.

Dr. RUEHE. That is right.

Senator ELLENDER. Of course, they do, and that does not make them for or against it. The mere fact that Swift, Armour, and Wilson handle butter and oleomargarine, I do not believe necessarily indicates that they are for or against it. And I would venture to say that probably 90 percent of the membership of your association handle both butter and margarine.

Dr. RUEHE. No.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, what is the percentage?

Dr. RUEHE. I do not suppose over 10 percent.

Senator AIKEN. Well, with two or three exceptions, are not Swift and Armour the largest manufacturers of butter in this country?

Dr. RUEHE. Yes; with two or three exceptions.

Senator AIKEN. Are they not also the largest manufacturers of oleomargarine?

Dr. RUEHE. I cannot speak for them, Senator Aiken, but I think you would find that their policy would be that they want to sell oleomargarine on its own merits.

Senator AIKEN. In this particular case, their policy is hands off. It strikes me as being peculiar that Dr. Ruehe is here testifying on behalf of the same people who were against it yesterday.

Senator ELLENDER. Some corporations find it very convenient to be on both sides of a question, many times. Thank you very much, Dr. Ruehe.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, Mr. F. M. Skiver, representing Michigan State department of agriculture, appeared against oleo and other butter substitutes before the Senate Agriculture Committee recently, and he submitted the following testimony, which should convince every dairyman in America that his industry is being threatened by the invasion of the domestic market by inferior so-called substitutes. The success of the oleo industry has been made possible by misrepresentation of the comparative food value of butter and its substitutes. I suggest that every Member of this House read Mr. Skiver's testimony carefully. Mr. Skiver's statement follows:

STATEMENT OF F. M. SKIVER, REPRESENTING MICHIGAN STATE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. SKIVER. Senator, my name is F. M. Skiver. I represent the Michigan State Department of Agriculture, which department is charged with enforcement of all Michigan laws pertaining to dairy products and other foods. I am at present director of the bureau of dairying, and have for the past 15 years been engaged in enforcement of Federal and State laws and regulations governing the production, handling, and sale of dairy products.

The Michigan Department of Agriculture is definitely opposed to lowering the present Federal tax on oleomargarine as proposed by bill S. 1744. We believe this bill, if enacted into law, would permit almost unhampered manufacture and sale of oleomargarine made and colored in imitation and semblance of yellow butter.

The present Federal tax of 10 cents a pound on oleomargarine, colored yellow in imitation of butter, serves the very definite purpose of preventing fraud through representation and sale of such a product as butter.

Recently, oleomargarine, colored in imitation of yellow butter, has been sold at retail stores, and served in dining rooms in Michigan. In several instances it has been sold and served as butter. This is a misrepresentation and is a fraud upon the consumer. This yellow oleomargarine is a mixture of from 77 to 79 percent vegetable oil, 16.76 to 19 percent water, and 2.85 to 3.03 percent salt. It contains in the fat 7.7 parts per million of carotene equivalent—4,000 units of vitamin A per pint.

In February 1944 the manufacturer of the above-mentioned product obtained a circuit court order restraining the Michigan Department of Agriculture from enforcing our statute pertaining to the sale of oleomargarine. In November 1943 complaint was filed by the same manufacturer in Federal district court in Detroit, Mich., against the collector of internal revenue to restrain him from collecting the 10-cent tax on yellow oleomargarine.

It will take many months to obtain final decisions in these cases and in the meantime this yellow oleomargarine is being advertised and offered for sale as soya butter.

Senator AIKEN. You say that is soya oil margarine, or oleomargarine?

Mr. SKIVER. Yes.

Senator AIKEN. I have been trying for 2 days to find out what soya butter is, and none of the previous witnesses seemed to know what soya butter might be.

Mr. SKIVER. I have heard of it.

Senator AIKEN. I have had several people mention it to me, and I understand that has upset the oleomargarine people somewhat in itself.

Mr. SKIVER. I would not know.

Senator AIKEN. I have been trying to find out more about it, and you are the first witness who has told us anything about it so far.

Mr. SKIVER. I do not know just how to answer your question. I have a copy of that label here.

Senator AIKEN. Do you think it is made wholly from soya oil?

Mr. SKIVER. That is their claim.

Senator AIKEN. The natural soya oil, without the color removed;

Mr. SKIVER. No; the color is added.

Senator AIKEN. The color is added?

Mr. SKIVER. Yes. They claim that it is not oleomargarine.

Senator AIKEN. Where it is made with pure soya oil, with color added?

Mr. SKIVER. They claim it does not come under the definition of oleomargarine.

Senator AIKEN. Well, is that because the soybean was not grown in this country to any extent when the last amendments were put on the definition of oleomargarine?

Mr. SKIVER. I do not know just what their claims as to exemption from the oleomargarine statutes are, Senator.

Senator AIKEN. But they have filed papers in court?

Mr. SKIVER. That is right.

Senator AIKEN. Claiming exemption from the tax?

Mr. SKIVER. Yes.

Senator AIKEN. Do you know who makes this soya butter, so called?

Mr. SKIVER. Yes, sir. It is made in Michigan.

Senator AIKEN. Have you the label?

Mr. SKIVER. I have one of the labels.

Senator AIKEN. I was wondering if it could be made easily anywhere. Could anyone make it at home?

Mr. SKIVER. I am not familiar with that. I understand it is made from refined soybean oil.

Senator AIKEN. Is it a small company that makes it?

Mr. SKIVER. I believe that it is rather a comparatively small company.

Senator AIKEN. Then if the court upholds their contention, we are going to have a new and rather radical situation injected into the field of the oleomargarine and butter controversy. I would think so, anyway.

Mr. SKIVER. If both the Federal and State courts uphold their contention.

Senator AIKEN. If they are upheld, what would hinder, instead of 18 manufacturers being in the market, 1,800, or 18,000 small manufacturers going into the business?

Mr. SKIVER. There is nothing to hinder them.

Senator AIKEN. You have the advertisement here?

Mr. SKIVER. Yes, I have it, to read into the record.

Senator AIKEN. I am interested, because I have been trying to find out for 2 days what this soya butter situation might be.

Mr. SKIVER. I prefer not to submit this for the record, as we have to have it for our case in the State court.

Senator AIKEN. Then we will not take it.

Mr. SKIVER. However, I am glad to show you that, and here is the advertising.

Senator AIKEN. This label reads:

"Butler's soya butter. Patent pending. Butler Food Products, Cedar Lake, Mich. Contents: 1 pint. Contains hardened soya oil, vim-ilk, salt, carex, and flavoring, not less than 4,000 United States Pharmacopoeia units of vitamin A."

And then a description:

"Soya butter is a 100 percent vegetable product developed in our laboratory. It is made from soya oil and other parts of the soybean."

What other parts might that be, do you know?

Mr. SKIVER. No; I do not know, Senator. To my knowledge it would be very small.

Senator AIKEN. A small portion?

Mr. SKIVER. It would be a very small percentage, because it is 77 percent fat, and up to 19 percent moisture, and 3 percent salt. It would be a very small percentage of any other part of the soybean.

Senator AIKEN. And then the description on the label goes on to say:

"Blended into a palatable and tasty vegetable spread. May be used freely by those who wish to maintain normal weight. Try Butler's vegetable shortening made of whole soya and parts of meal. The dietary trend is toward soya, the wonder food. Enjoy these benefits by using Butler's foods regularly."

Is this product finding a ready sale? Do you know about that?

Mr. SKIVER. It is sold in many instances.

Senator AIKEN. How does the price compare with common oleomargarine?

Mr. SKIVER. In Michigan—I am reading from this ad, Senator, it is advertised at 36 cents retail. In Washington, D. C., 59 cents retail.

Senator AIKEN. No ceiling on it?

Mr. SKIVER. No ceiling. The Michigan ad reads "No pts." I do not know if there is an O. P. A. ceiling.

Senator ELLENDER. Is it not in violation of the law to label that "Butter"?

Mr. SKIVER. We feel it is. They have a restraining order against our State department of agriculture, and the department of internal revenue.

Senator ELLENDER. How long has that been processed?

Mr. SKIVER. To our knowledge since, oh, possibly early last winter. Now they obtained a restraining order against the department of internal revenue in November, and against our Michigan Department of Agriculture in February.

Senator ELLENDER. What is the color of that butter?

Mr. SKIVER. Yellow.

Senator ELLENDER. That must be made from the same product as the samples produced by Mr. Hopkins.

Mr. SKIVER. No; I do not think so; I doubt it very seriously.

Senator ELLENDER. Mr. Hopkins testified, as I recall, that the margarine, as he called it, that was the product of pure soybean oil, was yellow.

Mr. SKIVER. The color is added to this in the form of carex. That is stated on the label here. Carex is the trade name for carotene, and our laboratory analysis shows carotene is in it, and vitamin A.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, was that placed in it to give it color, or add the vitamins, do you know?

Mr. SKIVER. For both, I imagine, because there are only 4,000 units of vitamins added.

Senator ELLENDER. I thought carotene was a substance to add vitamins, and not color.

Mr. SKIVER. I believe not. I am not an authority on that, but I have never seen carex that was not colored yellow.

I believe I was referring to the ad, and I was quoting this advertisement:

"Soya butter. No. pts. Pint carton 36 cents. Save on butter."

This is quoted from an advertisement in the Lansing State Journal on Thursday, May 18, 1944, and Thursday, May 25, 1944.

This yellow oleomargarine is one of the products manufactured and sold by a concern using several large 6 feet by 15 feet outdoor billboards, to advertise in the following words:

"Visitors welcome to plant. The magic food of perfect vitamins. Products of soybeans. Replaces: Meat, milk, cheese, butter, coffee. Home of Butler food prod. Cedar Lake."

Senator ELLENDER. Mr. Skiver, do you know whether or not those people who manufacture this soya butter escape the tax?

Mr. SKIVER. They are not paying the tax now, due to the restraining order, Senator.

Senator ELLENDER. I see. Well, has any effort been made by the Internal Revenue Department to collect taxes prior to the issuance of the injunction order?

Mr. SKIVER. I would not know definitely as to that. I presume that it was, which was the reason for the restraining order.

Senator ELLENDER. Is this material soft, or must you heat it in order to be able to use it as a spread?

Mr. SKIVER. Oh, it spreads just like butter.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, has it the appearance of butter?

Mr. SKIVER. Yes, sir; the appearance, the flavor, the odor, and the color and the taste.

Senator ELLENDER. Do they use any milk fats in its manufacture?

Mr. SKIVER. They claim not. They claim that there is no animal ingredients in there. In fact, one of the complaints in their case against our Department, and against the Internal Revenue Department is that the manufacturer is a member of the Seventh-day Adventists, and that several of the people in that sect are vegetarians and do not want any animal products in their food. The complaint is that to prohibit the manufacture of this would be a violation of the Constitution permitting religious freedom.

Senator ELLENDER. Is this the only company that manufactures that product, to your knowledge?

Mr. SKIVER. To my knowledge it is, Senator.

Senator ELLENDER. What is the capacity, do you know?

Mr. SKIVER. No; I do not know what the capacity is. I would say it is rather large. Our inspectors went in there some time back and were refused samples of the ingredients going into the product.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, you could or could not detect them chemically by using the product itself?

Mr. SKIVER. We can, pretty well.

Senator ELLENDER. Have you made an analysis of it?

Mr. SKIVER. Yes.

Senator ELLENDER. Proceed.

Mr. SKIVER. A second ad used on those billboards is:

"For goodness sake—Butler's products. Soybean foods. Replaces: Meat, milk, butter, cheese, coffee. Cedar Lake, Mich. On M46—18 m. west of Alma."

During the existence of these restraining orders against the internal-revenue collector and against the Michigan Department of Agriculture, this yellow oleomargarine is being manufactured, advertised, and sold, and the Federal Food and Drug Administration have taken no action to control the product.

On Tuesday, June 6, 1944, several representatives of the Federal Food and Drug Administration were in my office in Lansing and we discussed this problem. At that time they informed me that they had previously made an investigation of this product and could find no grounds which would permit them to prosecute. On what theory they assumed that they could do nothing to protect the public against this product, I do not know, although they indicated that they would be powerless unless there was interstate commerce involved. However, since coming to Washington, I have been convinced that the interstate commerce problem could not be the deterrent, because I found the product offered for sale at a store located at 1228 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

Senator AIKEN. Well, evidently in petitioning the court for an injunction, the manufacturers stated that the product was sold just within the State. I am just assuming that.

Mr. SKIVER. I do not believe it would be necessary, Senator, to stipulate that, because in our case it would not matter; it was sold in the State, anyway. In the Internal Revenue case, as I understand, they must pay the tax, whether it is in interstate commerce or not; they must pay if it is manufactured. Now that is my understanding of it. I did not notice it in either one of the bills.

Senator ELLENDER. We will not go into that.

Mr. SKIVER. I was unable to purchase a sample myself because it was necessary to pay six points (though no points are charged in Michigan for it, and the ad, as I read you a while ago, says no points).

This leaves control entirely to State laws and the Federal internal-revenue tax, which control is now temporarily restrained by court order. Since the Federal Food and Drug Administration cannot control this yellow oleomargarine, repeal of the internal-revenue tax would leave entire control of the product to Michigan State laws.

In our enforcement of State food laws we have been asked to cooperate and work with Federal authorities for enforcement of Federal laws, orders, and regulations. We have worked with the Federal Food and Drug Administration, the War Food Administration, the Food Distribution Administration, the Internal Revenue Department, and other Federal agencies; in fact, my men are working with them at this time.

We believe it is necessary that Federal laws governing foods shall act as an aid to enforcement of State laws in the prevention of fraud and deception. In the absence of the 10-cent tax on oleomargarine colored yellow in imitation of butter, all oleomargarine would be colored yellow and the fraudulent practices cited as presently taking place in Michigan would immediately spread to all States and be multiplied thousands of times. The extent of this fraud will be readily recognized from the fact that this imitation product is offered for sale in pint cartons weighing only $13\frac{3}{16}$ ounces at the exorbitant price of 43 cents a pint in Michigan and 59 cents a pint in Washington, D. C., and the 10 cents Federal tax is not being paid.

Such frauds, if permitted in the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, would immediately be apparent in the sale of other dairy products. In Michigan, we have found filled milk being advertised as milk. A mixture of cream and vegetable oil is now being widely sold for use as whipping cream in Michigan and other States. We have recently found fraud in the manufacture and sale of ice cream containing a high percentage of vegetable oil. The manufacture and sale of this ice cream involved violations of O. P. A. and W. F. A. orders.

In conclusion I want to reiterate that from our experience and observations, we are sure that the most practical way of preventing wholesale fraud upon the consumer is through the use of the present tax on oleomargarine that is colored yellow in imitation of butter.

Senator AIKEN. Can you say why this soya butter should cost more than oleomargarine?

Mr. SKIVER. No; I do not know.

Senator AIKEN. Yet it is selling for almost three times the price of oleomargarine.

Mr. SKIVER. My only conclusion is there is an exorbitant profit in the manufacture and handling of it. I am not familiar with the prices, but from comparison of the prices of this product with the price of oleomargarine, it is a great deal higher than the retail price of oleomargarine.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, Mr. Skiver, do you think it is possible for Congress to enact suitable legislation so as to prevent the fraud that you have discussed during your presentation of this matter? In other words, what confuses me is that I cannot for the life of me see how, by the payment of a tax, you can prevent fraud. Certainly the manufacture of it is not stopped, and in order that the product may be sold as margarine, oleomargarine, or whatever other label you want to put on that, whether you have a 5-cent tax or a 10-cent tax, the same things relating to what may cause fraud, exist, and the mere imposition of a 10-cents-per-pound tax, to my way of thinking, does not act as a deterrent to the practices of fraud. Now, as I indicated this morning to Mr. Brigham, I think it was, who was a witness against the bill, he stated that in his State, as I recall it, oleomargarine sold for 25 cents per pound, or 26 cents, and butter for 51 cents, or a difference of 26 cents. Now, instead of making the difference 16 cents in place of 26 cents, I cannot quite get through my head how the payment of a tax will circumvent fraud. And if you have any views on that, I should like to have them in the record.

Mr. SKIVER. Well, I am sure that in the past it has limited the manufacture and sale of it.

Senator ELLENDER. I do not doubt that in the least.

Mr. SKIVER. To the extent where fraud did not occur, whereas these orders have been placed against us and the Internal Revenue Department, it has occurred.

Senator ELLENDER. I do not doubt that in the least, and my contention is that the purpose of that tax is to prevent the manufacture of oleomargarine, so that it will not be so highly competitive to butter. Am I not stating it right?

Mr. SKIVER. Well, I do not know as to the purpose of it.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, you put it on a broad basis, and I cannot follow you. I do not mean to say that you are "trying to put anything over," or anything like that.

Mr. SKIVER. No.

Senator ELLENDER. What I should like for any witness who testifies hereafter to do, is to tell me how the imposition of a tax will act as a deterrent to fraud. My contention is that it is a deterrent to the manufacture of it in quantities that may compete head-on with butter.

Mr. SKIVER. I think that that may be so, and in reciting these experiences, it was my wish to show that fraud was not prevalent until this product was manufactured and colored in imitation of butter. It is sold as butter. It is served in hotel dining rooms as butter.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, now, would your attitude on this problem be in anywise changed if we could enact a law wherein no tax shall apply on margarine that is manufactured totally from products that are grown in this country; that is, totally from oils produced in this country, and should margarine be produced from foreign oils then the tax shall apply? And then I will state further, put almost any law within reason on the statute books so as to make it certain that when a person buys margarine he will know he is buying margarine, in other words, decrease the possibility of fraud, now what would be your slant if it were possible to do that?

Mr. SKIVER. I do not feel qualified, Senator, to answer all that. However, I will say that it was the feeling when the Pure Food and Drugs Act was passed and the present definition of oleomargarine was established, that that would serve to prevent fraud, which it evidently has not in this case.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, of course, I cannot do it at the moment, but I am sure I could cite you many, many acts that have been amended from year to year. For instance, in the sale of gasoline in my State. I was the speaker of the house there in 1932, and prior to that time I served as floor leader, and while I was floor leader I believe that we passed in my State one of the first laws providing for a tax on gasoline. You would be surprised to know the number of amendments that we had to make to that law from year to year in order to stop fraud, in order to prevent people from buying gas without paying the tax and to prevent other violations. I have been legislating for my own State and the country at large now for, oh, almost 20 years, and I believe sincerely that it would be possible to draft a law to prevent fraud and make the penalties so strict that they would act as a deterrent for one who would attempt to sell margarine and say it is butter. I understand, of course, that we might get some chiselers who would get by, just as you have in the liquor trade today. We have a lot of rules and regulations about that, but somehow some folks make pretty good corn whisky in Kentucky and Georgia, maybe in Louisiana, for all I know, and those lawbreakers simply get by the law. And I do not need to tell you also that we have a lot of criminal statutes on the books today that are flagrantly violated, and sometimes we cannot catch the culprits. And I do not pose as being able to draft a law that will catch all fraudulent violators, but I do believe that it is possible for us to draft an act that would substantially and materially prevent the fraudulent practices you and the other gentlemen have been talking about, and I believe the public can be better protected from fraud through the imposition of penalties than by the imposition of a tax. I am glad, however, that you were frank enough to state that the purpose of the tax was to curtail the production of margarine, and that is the way I feel about it.

Mr. SKIVER. Well, I do not know that that is the purpose of it, Senator. That is the way it has acted in our case, that at least it was not true until the order was issued.

Senator ELLENDER. Have you anything further you desire to state?

Mr. SKIVER. No; I do not believe I have, Senator.

Speech of Acceptance of Hon. Harry S. Truman, of Missouri, at Lamar, Mo.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Friday, September 1), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, last week it was my privilege to attend the notification ceremonies which were held at Lamar, Mo., at which our colleague the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] was notified of his nomination for the high office of Vice President of the United States.

Mr. President, the notification ceremonies were held in what to some might seem to be a small and insignificant country town in the great State of Missouri, but as I walked around the town square and mingled with the people from that section of Missouri and from Arkansas, Oklahoma, and Kansas, I was appreciative of what seemed to me to be a more or less significant fact. I may add that I enjoyed being in that community because it is the kind of a community I have known all my life. As I walked around there and watched the people I thought that men of lesser caliber might have chosen a larger place, where the fanfare would have been greater and the great white light of publicity might have shone stronger; and the thought also came to me that the greater the man the more does he appreciate the simpler and, to me, the finer things of life. I think it is a rare tribute to our colleague, the Democratic candidate for Vice President of the United States that he chose to go to that humble city and there in the town of his birth be notified of the signal honor which has been conferred upon him by his party. I think, Mr. President, it is a mark of true greatness, and, in keeping with the surroundings and in keeping with the greatness of the occasion, the Senator delivered what to me was a great and significant speech. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the speech he delivered on that occasion be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, members of the notification committee, and fellow citizens, I am deeply honored to have been named as the Democratic Party's candidate for the Vice Presidency and accept with humility and a prayer for guidance that I may perform honorably and well whatever tasks are laid before me.

Upon being nominated for the office of Vice President of the United States, my first wish was to express my appreciation to the members of the Democratic Party.

I have wanted since then to address my fellow-Americans everywhere, regardless of party, so that I might offer a statement concering the critical times that lie ahead.

Franklin Delano Roosevelt is my leader and Commander in Chief. In the past I have supported the policies formulated by him to protect and advance the welfare of our Nation. I will continue to do so and will continue my efforts to make certain that those policies are carried out promptly and efficiently by those entrusted with their administration.

We have long been engaged in a desperate struggle to preserve our liberties and to safeguard the American way of life. Many of our brave citizens have given their lives to win for us the certainty of victory, now assured. All of us now toil and sacrifice to win this most terrible of all wars. Victory is now in sight. Our courageous well trained and completely equipped soldiers and sailors are beating down the enemy wherever he can be found. Their unequalled valor under the greatest leadership ever given a fighting force guarantees the victory.

The task of the Government has been to provide that leadership, as well as the foresight which will enable victory to be won as soon as possible. When victory is won, Government must provide for our returning veterans and our war workers an assurance that their sacrifices were not in vain; that they will return to a country worth fighting for; that they will have an opportunity to earn a good living; and that the same humane principles and policies for the protection of the average man and woman carried out under Franklin D. Roosevelt for the past 12 years will be continued under his leadership.

Although victory may be close at hand, it must still be won. Our enemies are still numerous and well equipped. They have the advantage of fighting on the very threshold of their homes. We must fight in every climate and on every terrain. We must transport our armed forces and their equipment—and maintain them—thousands of miles from our shores. Our enemies are fanatical and desperate. They chant hymns of hate and utter threats that before they succumb they will destroy the foundations of our civilization, so painfully and slowly erected by the hard work of generations of mankind.

The carrying out of plans already made to overwhelm the enemy and the formulation of new policies as the occasion demands requires the coordination of all our resources and all of our people. The skill and ability of the military, of business, of labor, and of agriculture must all be directed with initiative, with courage, with foresight, and with experience, just as they have been since the emergency actually began. We know from the success of our efforts to date that under the continued leadership of President Roosevelt these objectives will be accomplished.

Under his leadership we have met one crisis after another, in peace and war. In each of these crises we have had anxious moments when we faced the fearful possibilities of national disaster. No one can ever forget the prayerful moments that preceded our successes in Africa, in Italy, in France, and in the Pacific. Those successes were possible because our fighting men had what they needed, where they needed it, and when they needed it. Much of the credit for this must be given to the wise decisions of the President. None but the most uninformed questions the fact that Franklin Roosevelt did make those vital decisions in collaboration with the great leaders of our war allies. Those decisions brought about the greatest succession of victories in the annals of warfare.

Tomorrow's challenge is today's problem. The proven leadership of our successes must continue. The fortunes of the future for which our boys have fought, bled, and died, must not be endangered by entrusting them to inexperienced hands. There is no substitute for experience, which can be gained only through years of application and service.

I am confident that the people of the United States, and I know that the people of my own home State of Missouri, may be trusted in this vital hour, to choose their President from a standpoint of proven experience and qualification. They will not choose for President, by political chance, a man who lacks experience.

In the struggle to rid the world of enemies of Democracy, the firing of the last shot on the battlefield marks but a beginning. Military victory over Germany is but a step. Military victory over Japan, though it may follow with all possible speed, will be but the completion of one turn in a long road.

War has taught us that, whether we like it or not, we cannot build a wall of isolation around the United States. Our very existence depends upon the establishment and maintenance of a sound and just peace throughout the world.

If you ask the historian why we failed to bring about a lasting peace after World War No. 1, he will answer, "A partisan struggle for political power." Let us remember the warning of Woodrow Wilson. He stressed that in an effort to make peace partisan politics should be adjourned.

"Partisan politics" he said, "has no place in the subject we are now obliged to discuss and decide." His wisdom has been proved by the test of time.

We have another historical parallel today. Make no mistake about the fact that once again we also have among us a group of isolationists as determined, as bitter, and as dangerous as the band who set themselves against the League of Nations and gave to Wilson's peace in 1920, a stab in the back.

Much work has been performed in the task of building for peace. The peace we seek is partly made. While the main task is yet ahead of us, world peace was actually in the process of making many months, even years ago.

The administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt was preparing the ground to support this peace structure when, against the bitter criticism and dire warnings of the isolationists and their press, Mr. Roosevelt first proposed lend-lease.

This peace was in process many months ago when two men met in mid-Atlantic and drew up a charter, a set of principles for peace that have been cited and used as guides by both Democrats and Republicans alike ever since they were first set forth.

This peace was being made at Casablanca, at Moscow, at Quebec, at Cairo, at Teheran. It was being made last week in our own Nation's Capital. It will be made in many other places, at many other times. It is a continuing process, already years under way, still years in prospect. We are, in our effort to make this peace, very definitely in midstream.

And this peace has been given life movement and certainty by the high resolve of the men who are making it. Neither time nor space nor the personal hazards of a world at war have been allowed to interrupt it.

The destruction that already has occurred and that which is reasonably certain to occur before the war finally is won will make this a most difficult task. The people of the earth will have to rebuild a new and greater prosperity from the ashes of the efforts of the many generations that preceded them. The nations, great and small, must adjust themselves to these new conditions, and must find a sane and sensible means of living together in friendship and with mutual advantage. We comprise but a small percentage of the people of the earth, and we shall have to guide the way with wise counsel and advice if we expect to play our full part in establishing a good and an enduring peace.

The end of hostilities may come suddenly. Decisions that will determine our future for years, and even generations to come, will have to be made quickly. If they are made quickly and wisely by those who have had years of experience and the fullest opportunities to become well informed with respect to our national and international problems, we can have confidence that the next generation will not have to spill its blood to rectify our mistakes and failures.

It takes time for anyone to familiarize himself with a new job. This is particularly true of the Presidency of the United States, the most difficult and complex job in the world. Even in peacetime it is well recognized that it takes a new President at least a year to learn the fundamentals of his job. We cannot expect any man wholly inexperienced in national and international affairs to readily learn the views, the objectives, and the inner thoughts of such divergent personalities as those dominant leaders who have guided the destinies of our courageous allies. There will be no time to learn, and mistakes once made cannot be unmade. Our President has worked with these men during these trying years. He talks their language—the language of nations. He knows the reasons which govern their decisions. Just as he respects them and their opinions, so do they respect him. At no time in our history has a President possessed such knowledge of foreign leaders and their problems. None has ever so completely won their confidence and admiration.

Winning the war and concluding the peace are only part of the task facing us during the next 4 years. We must also reestablish our own domestic economy.

To win the war we have shifted millions of workers hundreds and thousands of miles from their old homes; we have built thousands of fine new factories and equipped them with tens of thousands of the best machine tools; we have increased enormously our facilities for manufacturing basic commodities; we have evolved new processes for shaping materials and new uses for those materials.

We cannot go back to our pre-war status, for it is impossible to reshuffle our people into the old pattern. Nor can we throw into junk heaps $20,000,000,000 worth of new plants and equipment. Only by using them can we hope to provide good jobs for our brave fighting men when they return, and for our splendid war workers. With those plants we shall make more and better goods. We shall combine full employment with an even higher standard of living. By utilizing new methods and products discovered during the war, and by encouraging further research and invention, we shall insure the position of the United States as a leader of world progress.

The achievement of the goals the administration has set for the post-war Nation will not be easy. Already some selfish interests are complaining. If they can, they will prevent new independent enterprises from acquiring these plants—from hiring workmen and from putting into civilian production a flood of consumer goods at prices within the reach of all.

We must not accept the kind of thinking that during the 1920's kept Muscle Shoals and other World War No. 1 plants idle.

The administration proposes to see to it that these plants are sold or leased on fair terms to those who will use them to manufacture consumer goods, and to create employment for our fighting men and our men and women war workers.

If we devote the same ingenuity to production for peace in America that we have given to the making of engines of destruction in this war, our future will be secure. But to do this will require energy and courage. The forces of reaction, and the selfishness of those who always fear any kind of change, will have to be overcome. We cannot go back, as we tried to do in 1920. We cannot stand still. We must go forward.

On all of these great issues we know that President Roosevelt will take a progressive and courageous position, because his past record of able and forthright action speaks for itself.

As early as October 5, 1937, when few of us dreamed that war was approaching, Franklin Roosevelt in a speech at Chicago, warned that the peace and freedom of 90 percent of the world's people were being jeopardized by the remaining 10 percent, who were threatening a break down of all international law and order. You need not be reminded that he was then called an alarmist and a warmonger by the isolationists and their press—the same group that now seeks to block every advance he makes for the welfare of the country.

Despite strong opposition he pushed through the national defense program. He steered a course toward preparedness. Through his efforts we obtained Selective Service that enabled us to train a great army and to discover and supply its needs. Countless thousands of lives were saved by this one prophetic act. He advocated lend-lease which enabled the British and others to let contracts that gave us a full year's start on war production. He declared a national emergency that enabled our own defense program to make progress beyond anything ever before achieved in the history of the world. I need not recall to you the vitriolic violence of the opposition to these measures—nor the identity of those who opposed them.

Franklin Roosevelt set production goals that were ridiculed as fantastic and misleading. For example, his request in June 1940 for 50,000 planes. But under his leadership those goals were attained and even surpassed. Industry, labor and agriculture were coordinated and did cooperate to produce this inspired achievement.

Without this kind of leadership and preparation what would have been the fate of our Nation? Who can tell how many more years would have been required to win the war, and at what greater cost in lives?

On this greatest of all issues, the defense of the country, President Roosevelt was years ahead of his time, just as he was years ahead of his time when he fought for freedom from want and forced through protective legislation for labor, social security for the aged, work relief for the unemployed, and a farm program which saved the farmers. Just as he battled to protect the savings of small depositors, and for security regulations to prevent a repetition of the financial excesses of the twenties that brought on the depression.

You remember the battles he fought to accomplish all this, and you know the sources of his opposition. His opponents are still the same. But which of these great programs are they now willing to tell you they propose to destroy? Those programs have stood the acid test of the years, and the President's opponents dare not openly attack them.

Ask yourselves whether you dare to entrust the further development and growth of these great social reforms to those who not only were without the ability to develop these programs but who even lacked the foresight and courage to support them.

Ask yourselves whether you dare to entrust the negotiation of the peace of the world to those who are not familiar with world affairs.

The welfare of this Nation and its future, as well as the peace of the whole world depends upon your decision on November 7.

You can't afford to take a chance. You should endorse tried and experienced leadership—you should reelect Franklin D. Roosevelt president of the United States.

Reclamation Looks to Arizona's Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I will include a statement by Commissioner Harry M. Bashore, of the Bureau of Reclamation, before a Senate committee at Phoenix, Ariz., on July 31, 1944. Under the above caption Commissioner Bashore indicated the great work which had been done for Arizona through reclamation and pointed out some future prospects of still greater work which should logically follow the war. No portion of our country is more blessed by nature than is Arizona. No State presents a greater challenge to the hydraulic engineer and to the scientific man than does Arizona. Her rich river valley, under a subtropical sun and rich in soil, capable of producing abundantly throughout the entire year, offers the greatest return to reclamation. Her rivers, flowing through mile-deep canyons, offer great opportunity for power development, and all these being adjacent to proven mineral deposits lay the foundation for expanding industry. These facts are summarized in Commissioner Bashore's statement, which is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to appear before your committee. I shall first present a summary of what the Bureau of Reclamation has done in Arizona, what it is doing today, and what it is planning as a contribution to the permanent development of the State through the full use of the waters of the lower Colorado which may be allocated for irrigation and power production in Arizona. Members of my staff will give you detailed discussion on the several phases of our goals for your State.

There is more than an alphabetical reason for placing Arizona first in the roster of Reclamation-served States. Here are located two of the oldest and most successful projects under our jurisdiction. The first is the Salt River project near Phoenix, with 216,600 acres directly dependent on the system and 94,660 acres receiving supplemental service, and of equal significance is the Yuma project in southwestern Arizona, where 55,000 acres are under irrigation.

Arizona shares physically and financially in the operations of Boulder Dam, which has the largest power installation in the world. Parker Dam on the Colorado is an important source of power supply for Arizona. Imperial Dam of the All-American Canal system diverts water for irrigation in Arizona as well as California.

Imperial Dam is diverting water for one of the most constructive programs the Bureau of Reclamation has undertaken. On the Gila project, predevelopment of mesa desert land is being carried on to demonstrate the behavior of these sandy soils under irrigation and what crops they will produce with regulated application of water. The University of Arizona is cooperating in this endeavor, which will be of far-reaching importance in the settlement of the Gila project.

The war has retarded or halted many of our activities through the West, but the acceleration of construction on the Gila project to complete the irrigation system on the Yuma Mesa and extend service to the Wellton-Roll area are at the top of the Bureau's post-war list for Arizona. The resumption of construction on Davis Dam, for river regulation and power, can also be speeded up when hostilities cease. A second transmission line authorized for construction as a war measure from Parker Dam to Phoenix is a permanent feature of the Davis Dam project.

The Gila and Davis Dam projects and 14 others under study look to maximum use of Arizona waters for irrigation and power production in the post-war period. Our plans envisage irrigation of nearly half a million acres of new land with supplemental water for about 325,000 acres now irrigated. More than a million and a quarter of kilowatts of firm power from installations are possible in the potential projects. A total cost of $640,000,000—more than five times the outlay for Boulder Dam—is estimated.

Employment for returning servicemen and demobilized war industrial workers is the first goal. Permanent farm homes on irrigated land to balance the economy of your State is the long-time objective of the Bureau of Reclamation.

The construction of the projects that I will list for the record would provide employment in Arizona for an average of more than 20,000 over a period of 5 years. From 10,000 to 20,000 newly irrigated and permanent farm homes would be carved from the desert.

The permanent benefits in irrigated farms, stabilization of business, power for industries, and the expansion of the cities and towns will assure the prosperity not only of Arizona, but will make a substantial contribution to the development of the West and to a more secure future for the Nation.

The Salt River and Yuma projects, which serve about half of the total irrigated area in Arizona, are responsible in a major part for the present economic structure of the State. Before discussing the future development of the Colorado River Basin, let me take time to review the history of irrigation in Arizona which was climaxed by the passage of the Federal Reclamation Act by the Congress in 1902.

Irrigation on the American continent had its start in the Southwest. In the valleys of the Little Colorado, Salt, and Gila Rivers, and along the Verde River and smaller tributaries, we find remains of canals which indicate that, in an ancient civilization, Indians possessed skill in the science of irrigation.

Prehistoric canals in the Salt River Valley totaled in length at least 150 miles and were sufficient for the irrigation of 250,000 acres of land. Probably the whole area was never watered at any one time. Here primitive farmers, who lived a thousand years ago, raised cotton, corn, beans, squash, and tobacco.

The Jesuits—the first European irrigators in Arizona, followed by early Mexican colonists and Mormons—all of these people made desperate attempts to bring water to parched lands so that they could produce food.

After the War between the States canal construction was rapid, beginning with the old Swilling Ditch in 1867. Twenty years later about as much land had been reclaimed as could be irrigated from Salt River in seasons of meager flow. Additional acres, however, were put under cultivation until more land was reclaimed than could be irrigated by the meager water supplies available for direct diversion from streams. The storage of water during flood seasons for later use had not been developed.

You know the sequel. Drought came in 1898 and 1904, and with it anxious requests for some means of rescuing cultivated acres. The Reclamation Act of 1902 meant salvation for this land. Under this act the pioneers and their successors laid the foundation of a great State in the desert. The Salt River project was authorized for construction by the Secretary of the Interior on March 12, 1903. Not only was Salt River one of the first irrigation projects to be started under the Reclamation Act, but here the first power plant was constructed and operated in 1906 by the Bureau of Reclamation at Roosevelt Dam, which was completed in 1911.

The occasion for building this first power plant was to provide power needed in the construction of irrigation works. This plant demonstrated the economic double use of water stored for irrigation and power development and was the forerunner of the more than 30 plants which make the Bureau of Reclamation the largest single operator, public or private, of power plants in the country with an installed capacity of more than two and a quarter million kilowatts. Great hydroelectric plants help serve the multiple-purpose plans of Reclamation—bringing power for pumping irrigation water, power for farm homes, and large blocks of energy for industries vital to the prosecution of the war.

The Salt River project has proved its worth many times. Last year the crop value per acre was $157. Compare this with the crop report of 30 years ago when the average production per acre was $23.14. There are 12 towns within this project area. Phoenix, the largest, has a population now of over 120,000; the population in 1906—the year Roosevelt Dam was begun—was 9,000. The great growth of your capital city has been made possible in a large measure by the irrigation development on the Salt River project.

The Yuma project, located in the southwestern part of Yuma County, Ariz., and the southeastern part of Imperial County, Calif., on both sides of the Colorado River, had an average crop value last year of $172.

Water for irrigation in the Arizona section of the project is diverted from the Colorado River into the All-American Canal at Imperial Dam, and is delivered to the project at Siphon Drop, 15 miles south of Imperial Dam. The remainder of the irrigation water used on the California portion of the Yuma project is diverted from the Colorado River at Laguna Dam and delivered to the project through the California main canal.

Like the Salt River project, Yuma is famous for its high-quality vegetables, cantaloups, and grapefruit. The Yuma project also furnishes valuable forage and pasture for cattle and sheep which are brought to the project lands for feeding, particularly during the winter months when such feed is not available on the ranges.

Yuma is noted for its production of alfalfa seed, both because of the large per-acre yields and the viability of the seed produced.

Arizona shares with Nevada the honor of having the highest dam in the world and the largest power plant. By taming the Colorado River, Boulder Dam serves the multiple-purpose plan of the Bureau of Reclamation—a plan which includes flood control, power, navigation, irrigation, and municipal water supplies.

While the bulk of power from Boulder Dam goes to Los Angeles and nearby cities in southern California, Arizona is vitally interested in this gigantic structure. The potentialities of Boulder Dam in relation to irrigation have not been fully realized, but future generations in Arizona will be served by the giant which now rules the Colorado and forces it to do his bidding.

Not only will Arizona benefit from reclamation expansion through new homes, power for industries and agricultural increases, but she is making financial gains through the development of power. Under the Boulder Canyon Project Adjustment Act of July 19, 1940, Arizona receives annually $300,000 of Boulder Dam revenues and also shares in the Colorado River development fund, which is set up for irrigation and power investigations and construction.

From Parker Dam, downstream between Arizona and California, Colorado River water released from Boulder Dam is pumped into the aqueduct of the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California to provide a supplemental supply of domestic and industrial water for Los Angeles and 12 nearby cities.

One of the several functions performed by Parker Dam is its assistance to irrigation by reregulating the river discharge from Boulder Dam, thereby assuring a reliable supply of water for diversion at Imperial Dam, 153 miles below, for the irrigation of lands in lower Arizona, as well as in California.

Parker Dam was constructed by the Bureau of Reclamation with funds advanced by the metropolitan water district of southern California, an incorporated union of 13 coastal cities around and including Los Angeles. The power plant at the dam is operated by the Bureau of Reclamation, and the electric output is distributed largely in Arizona for industrial operations.

It goes to Phoenix, Tucson, and Yuma; the San Carlos and Colorado River Indian Reservations in Arizona; the Bagdad copper mine near Bagdad, Ariz.; the Gila reclamation project in southwestern Arizona; and the Imperial Valley in Imperial County, Calif.

The construction of Davis Dam at the Bullshead site also located on the Colorado River between Arizona and Nevada, was scheduled to begin in 1941 as another great defense project of the Bureau of Reclamation. Work, however, was stopped in December 1942 by the War Production Board, but will be resumed as soon as war conditions permit.

Davis Dam, when completed, will produce a billion kilowatt-hours of electric energy annually, will aid in the power operations of other projects on the river, and will help irrigation, through added regulation of the Colorado River. The new transmission line from Parker Dam to Phoenix that is being built as a war measure to meet urgent power needs in Arizona will serve Davis Dam when the latter is completed.

Newest of reclamation developments for Arizona is the Gila project, near Yuma, extending east from the Yuma Valley about 80 miles and south to the international boundary The immediate plans for the Gila project include the irrigation of nearly 150,000 acres on the Yuma-Mesa and in the Wellton-Roll area. When completed, the Gila project may serve a total of 585,000 acres.

Extension of irrigation beyond the Yuma-Mesa and the Wellton-Roll may depend upon further Bureau investigation, what the people of Arizona decide, and the Congress authorizes with respect to service to the interior of the State. Obviously, the controlling factor is not land but the amount of water that Arizona receives under the Colorado River compact.

The development of the Yuma-Mesa Gila lands poses many new and serious agricultural problems. For about 6 years the University of Arizona has been conducting exhaustive tests on alfalfa production at its Gila project farm, located on the mesa. This work has enabled the Bureau of Reclamation to demonstrate conclusively that under the practices developed by the university these mesa desert lands can be made highly productive under irrigation.

Between three and four hundred acres are now growing alfalfa, and seven or eight hundred additional acres are being cleared and leveled for planting to alfalfa this fall. The plans for predevelopment under authority granted by the War Production Board call for the predevelopment of 4,200 acres of public lands. Additional contracts will be let for clearing and leveling so that this work can proceed as rapidly as possible.

Alfalfa yields at a conservative estimate will average five tons to the acre annually, under ordinary management. When the many components which determine production are all handled efficiently, it has been demonstrated that production can range as high as ten to twelve tons to the acre. The initial cuttings on 115 acres planted to alfalfa in October 1943 have averaged over a ton each. At current prices for alfalfa hay in the Pacific Southwest, it will be possible to repay all costs of predevelopment with 1 or 2 years' production.

The Bureau of Reclamation is endeavoring to demonstrate what crops, in addition to alfalfa, the Gila Mesa lands can produce. We know that the Wellton-Mohawk lands, with a good irrigation supply, will produce cotton, winter vegetables, and the traditional cantaloupe-lettuce crops with excellent yields. Because the mesa lands are inherently low in organic matter, and because the water-holding capacity of the soil is relatively low, the commercial production of winter vegetables is not definitely established.

Although it has been amply demonstrated that citrus, particularly grapefruit, can be produced on the mesa lands, there is the added problem of marketing the fresh fruit. The Bureau of Reclamation is negotiating with the University of Arizona for a cooperative study looking into the potentialities of commercial vegetable production on mesa lands. Even if it should develop that only the valley lands are suitable for vegetable production, there is assurance that large acreages on the Yuma Mesa can be developed for growing alfalfa. I do not need to tell you how important the production of this feed crop will be to the livestock industry of Arizona.

All of the past and current work of the Bureau of Reclamation has been made possible by the hearty cooperation of the people of Arizona, your Senators and Representatives in Congress, your State officials, and your State legislature. We are not content to rest on these results but are looking to a future that will assure even greater achievements through a continuance of this cooperation. The recent action of the Arizona legislature in appropriating $250,000 for cooperative investigations with the Bureau of Reclamation to determine the best uses of the waters of the Colorado River was a heartening step. Your great university has worked with us on agricultural problems.

Last October, Senator CARL HAYDEN, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Roads and Reclamation of the Senate Committee on Post-war Economic Planning and Policy, called on the Bureau of Reclamation for an inventory of irrigation and multiple-purpose projects which could be made ready for construction in the post-war period to give employment for returning servicemen and demobilized civilian war workers. The foresight of Senator HAYDEN in this respect, as well as the forward-looking move of Senator MCFARLAND in setting up this study by Senate Resolutions Nos. 155 and 304, are evidences of the vision of the representatives of Arizona at Washington, where Representatives MURDOCK and HARLESS also have been of great assistance.

In pursuance of Senator HAYDEN's request, the Bureau of Reclamation set to work and on June 6 presented to the Senate committee an inventory in which Arizona projects hold a prominent part. I will quote briefly from a résumé of the possibilities for developments in your State and will leave further details to other members of my staff:

"Two major areas are eligible for the greater part of the Colorado River water which has been allocated to Arizona under the Colorado River compact—the Paradise Valley region north of Phoenix and the Gila project east of Yuma. The new lands in the vicinity of Phoenix would be reached by one on the several plans to divert water from the Colorado.

"There is a potential area of 300,000 acres of new lands; also a supplemental supply would be assured to an additional 300,000 acres now in production. This gross acreage would be subject to reappraisal following completion of land classification. In addition, there are a number of small scattered projects in the northern half of the State which offer an opportunity to supply both primary and supplemental water to relatively small acreages, which are, nevertheless, significant in their economic contribution to the State. These include the Chino Valley, Snowflake, Winslow, Holbrook, and Hassayampa.

"The Wellton-Mohawk unit of the Gila project, consisting of 81,000 acres of new land and 16,000 acres to be served with a supplemental supply, is high in priority for post-war consideration. Other developments under study include: Buttes, Coconino, Sentinel, and Bill Williams-Alamo Reservoir. These combine the functions of irrigation, river regulations, silt control, flood control, and power.

"Power installations at Boulder Dam and Parker Dam are now supplying the larger part of the power needs of southern California and Arizona in the expanded war program. Additional power will be developed at Davis Dam, now authorized for construction, but stopped by order of the War Production Board. Construction of the Bridge Canyon Dam above Boulder would make possible an additional power installation of 750,000 kilowatts and also provide for silt control."

Bridge Canyon is looked to as the key project for post-war expansion in Arizona. Bridge Canyon will lengthen the life of Lake Mead at Boulder Dam by controlling silt. It will produce power and store water for diversion at some point downstream through a proposed Phoenix diversion system which would serve a gross area of 300,000 acres of new land in central Arizona and supplement existing water supplies for 300,000 additional acres.

In his capacity as Regional Director of this area, Mr. E. A. Moritz, who has had wide experience, will have the responsibility of helping Arizona carry out the post-war plans which we have outlined. As you know under the decentralization plan of the Bureau of Reclamation, Arizona is in region 3, which also includes southwestern Nevada and southern California. This plan is designed to bring the activities of the Bureau closer to the people of the West whom it serves and seeks to serve in the post-war period.

If we are to judge by population trends of the past 4 years, Arizona will be a major State where public works and permanent settlement opportunities will be in demand. Arizona has had the greatest percentage increase in population since 1940 of any State in the Union. You may expect to hold the major part of the 40 percent gain you have made in the war years, and your problems will be intensified by returning servicemen and demobilized civilian war workers.

Many of your problems arising from the influx of population may be solved by the transiation of these proposed reclamation projects into reality. But even as we envision a stabilized agriculture founded on irrigation, we realize that the projects listed in the inventory are dependent, first, on the appropriations by the Congress for the completion of field investigations of water supplies, land classification, other factors, and preconstruction work, and, second, on the authorization and appropriations for actual construction, as well as assurances of adequate water supplies are essential.

The construction work on all of the Arizona projects listed in the inventory, which I submit for the RECORD, would give employment at the rate of an average of 12,000 men for 5 years. The related benefits to the State at large, the West, and the entire country would aid materially in the solution of the problems incident to the transition from war to a peacetime economy.

Let us visualize for a moment what the irrigation of nearly half a million acres of new land that I have mentioned would mean, using the common denominator of the word, home. With the new lands developed under irrigation and supplemental water brought to a large area now irrigated, the farm population of Arizona would be increased from 35,000 to 60,000 people.

Since the time of Alexander the Great men have complained that they could find no more lands to conquer. We of the Reclamation Service know that there are still lands in the great Southwest where our two weapons—water and power—can conquer drought and despair. And as these enemies of mankind are routed, we can build a greater Southwest with the help of those who will seek employment here in our permanent public works.

Hydroelectric power possible through multiple-purpose projects would stimulate the production of Arizona's vast mineral resources. Linked with irrigation, which is the predominant use for the waters in the West, these potential developments by the Bureau of Reclamation offer a golden opportunity for Arizona to share with other States the riches of the Colorado River basin, and to give renewed meaning to her motto Ditat Deus—God Enriches.

Accent on Youth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the following letter of Mr. Henry W. Reger, of Indianapolis, Ind., is a complete answer to the New Deal position against the ability of youth:

ACCENT ON YOUTH

To the EDITOR of the INDIANAPOLIS STAR:

There are some who are using the argument of youth and inexperience against Tom Dewey, who is 42 years old and Governor of New York, with an unequaled record as a prosecutor and Governor.

In reviewing the lives of famous statesmen of yesteryear, you will find that Thomas Jefferson was a mere youngster of 33 when he penned our leading state document, the Declaration of Independence. The Federalist, a set of 85 articles explaining and advocating the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, was written by Alexander Hamilton, aged 30; James Madison, aged 36; and John Jay, aged 42.

Alexander Hamilton was only 32 when he placed our financial system on a sound basis. In the successful operation of the new government his work was masterful. John Jay, our first Chief Justice, was only 32 when he put on the robe of justice. George Washington was the age of Tom Dewey when he took command of the Continental Army.

The average age of the framers of our Constitution was less than 40. One framer and signer was only 26 years of age, 4 were under 30, and 21 were less than 40. Who would be stupid enough to say that they were too young to handle the task when they instituted democracy in its finest form.

Looking further into the lives of great men, we find Alexander the Great was a mere boy, in his early twenties, when he ruled the world of his time. Napoleon was only 35 when he became Emperor of France, was a mere youngster when he held all Europe in subjection.

Disraeli and Gladstone were younger than Dewey at the height of their careers. William Pitt, the greatest English statesman, had all the old heads of Europe seeking his advice when he was only 30.

Finally, the Master of Men, who formulated the perfect set of laws and rules for men to live by, completed his task at 33.

In the light of the foregoing, Dewey's youth speaks for him.

HENRY W. REGER.

INDIANAPOLIS.

Governor Dewey and Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Friday, September 1), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two editorials from the Lincoln (Nebr.) Star.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"OLD MAN" HULL IN SHIRT SLEEVES

In a military sense, this week end was the most cheering to the peoples of the Allied world since the beginning of the war. Hitler's armies were reeling. But there was one sour note. It best can be described in Washington dispatches.

AN ANGRY HULL

"Newsmen," Leon Pearson wrote, "who crowded Hull's office yesterday (Thursday), within a few hours after Governor Dewey had issued his attack on the Big Four world security plan, found the 'old man' in his shirt sleeves, nervously fingering his spectacles on a black silk ribbon, and eager to enter battle—not for politics but for peace. For an hour they listened to his high-pitched voice, rasping through the record of what he has done to prevent recurrence of the unspeakable experience of war. It was a 'background conference', which meant that Hull was not to be quoted directly. So he spoke with far more freedom than usual, and with the colorful language that only his intimates know. He denounced the Dewey charges of 'Big Four' domination of the world. Time after time, he repeated the words 'nonpartisan' and 'non-political,' as he has been doing for months past, in an effort to keep the new peace plans out of the campaign."

WORD TO DEWEY

Then Secretary Hull did a wholly unprecedented thing in American political history. Publicly, he anounced he would be glad to meet with Governor Dewey or with any man Dewey might designate to discuss international peace for the simple purpose of keeping that issue out of partisan politics. That action of Hull's has no precedent in American political history and is the measure of Mr. Roosevelt's and Mr. Hull's desire to keep world peace from becoming the football of party politics and a presidential candidacy, as in the instance of the Lodge conspiracy in the campaign of 1920.

FATHERLY ADVICE

It was, in effect, the action of a man who, in off political seasons, Republicans and Democrats alike have praised highly for his handling of foreign affairs, saying to a beginner: "Now, young man, you have said a nasty, ugly thing. You have voiced a sinister suspicion. It is time you should grow up and put away your rompers. So that you may know what it is all about, come over and see me sometime, or if you prefer, send whomever you may desire to confer with me."

ALWAYS A GENTLEMAN

Of course, Cordell Hull did not use that language, at least publicly. As a gentleman from Tennessee, he remained true to the traditions of the cult. His invitation to Governor Dewey was couched in the most courteous, patient language, and Mr. Dewey's quick acceptance was equally commendable. So, before long, it appears that Hull and Dulles, Dewey's confidential foreign adviser, will sit down in the shade of the tree and talk things over. It is well that this is the climax of a young man's impetuosity that had every earmark of much mischief. For Cordell Hull's latchstring has been out not only to Mr. Dewey, but to the Republican Members of the Senate, with whom he has conferred repeatedly, in the sole hope of averting a ghastly world tragedy at the close of the ghastly business of war.

THE GREAT BUILD-UP

There is more to it than this. Senator HAROLD BURTON, of Ohio, in a public statement, hailed Governor Dewey's acceptance of Mr. Hull's invitation on international affairs as "a constructive and important step that demonstrates Governor Dewey's clear understanding of the needs of the times." It was most commendable and nothing short of commendable. It would have been even more commendable if, instead of blowing his top with a blast against "cynical power politics" to set in circulation fears that had no actual existence in fact beyond Mr. Dewey's own head, publicly he had requested a conference on these matters "to keep the issue of peace out of party politics."

With full credit to Governor Dewey, Senator BURTON'S omission is most significant. What is there while lauding Dewey to prevent him from saying a kindly word about a man, maliciously and falsely accused of a heinous design for "power politics" in the world, big enough to extend an invitation to the man who makes the false charge? It would seem Senator BURTON was looking out of only one eye.

A COMMON AILMENT

It is an ailment not confined solely to Senator BURTON. The same cruel astigmatism affects about 90 percent of the men writing editorials for American newspapers. What a big, a generous, and a statesmanlike attitude Governor Dewey reveals, they cry in the blackest type. Well, what about this quarrelsome old man in shirt sleeves, temporarily cussing in the picturesque language of the mountain regions of Tennessee, and then turning around to invite Mr. Dewey to conference? What about him? Is he a statesman? Is he big? Did he initiate an attack on Dewey's foreign policy, or did he reply patiently and generously to a young man who said a really nasty thing relating to a conference in Moscow which Mr. Hull attended in person? If Mr. Dewey's action is commendable, and it is, what about Mr. Hull's action? What about the misplaced emphasis? What about the one-eyed journalists, who in this matter of peace, for which a world badly bruised hungers, can see in one direction, and one direction only?

PUBLIC APATHY

There is more than this, unfortunately. Cordell Hull, Pearson reported, saved his strongest phrases for a denunciation of public apathy and an appeal for the spirit of '76. He recalled how Sam Adams literally worked his pants off appealing to the revolutionary patriots. He recalled the fight for Cuban independence. Some kind of stuff was developed in us that impelled us to go, he said, and if we hadn't public opinion would have given us a good, swift kick. Now people forget—they forget overnight. And then he expressed the wish that he could burn this into the public mind and memory for the next 50 years:

"That the human race this day, this hour, is confronted by the gravest crisis in all its history. You may sit down, or lie down, or go to sleep, or you may stand mute, but the responsibility for action will cling to you and you cannot escape it."

AS INEVITABLE AS DEATH

You cannot escape it. This decision and its effect upon the human race is as inevitable as death. What we do now in developing a durable peace will echo down through the centuries of this earth's existence. The mistakes we make, if we make mistakes, will bedevil our steps and blister our hides for the next hundred years. In all this nightmare of destruction and slaughter of the youth of the world, what we do now will give others to come a chance to breathe, to rebuild, and to live peaceful, normal lives, or will sentence them to endure the same agonies of folly.

TRANSCENDING EVENTS

On the battlefields, the thunder of guns, the roar of planes, and the rumble of thousands of tanks played a dirge for those wicked men and those cruel nations that set out to conquer the world. Germany's military might was dissolving in the fumes of battle in France. Incredibly, the German general staff and the soldiers under it were being cut to pieces. It may be a week, a month, or many months, but the Prussian militarist and the German people, who have initiated three bloody wars in Europe since 1870, were being brought to realization that defeat of any plan of world conquest, like death itself, is inevitable.

ON TO BERLIN

Back home President Roosevelt informed the American people that regardless of what happens to the German Army, the United Nations are going to march into Berlin and Tokyo. They are going to occupy Germany and Japan. That will be a finished job unlike the vain sacrifice of 1918. People may have doubts about going on to Berlin—the most honest and sincere people. They can have no doubt on the face of the grim, grisly evidence of recent years, that it was a mistake in 1918 not to go on to Berlin. That mistake will not be repeated. There is a place in this tired old world for experience in order that there shall be youth.

GOVERNOR DEWEY'S REVERBERATING "NO!"

There are times, it would appear, when a great newspaper like the Omaha World-Herald, long distinguished in Nebraska and far beyond the confines of this State for its editorial page, can make itself ridiculous.

Witness this:

"Governor Dewey enters a reverberating 'No!' and his 'No!' will serve to blast away the fog of uncertainty and secrecy and double-talk that rapidly has been enveloping the post-war issue. 'No!' says Dewey, to any proposal that the United States enter into a permanent military alliance of four big powers to rule the world. Together to utter defeat of the tyrants—yes. Together to disarm them—yes. Together to keep them permanently disarmed, to invoke force jointly against possible attempted future aggression—yes. But a world organization, and not a four-power military alliance. An organization in which all nations, great and small alike, 'shall be assured of their full right.' Any cynical agreement on the part of the Four Powers to dominate the world by force and in 'spheres of influence,' says Dewey, would be 'reactionary—the rankest form of imperialism—immoral.' Challenging words, these."

It has been quite apparent for years that it does not take much to challenge the World-Herald's thought, so long as any expression is in opposition and away from Mr. Roosevelt's foreign and domestic policies.

It is reasonable to anticipate that when this was written there was in the editorial rooms of the Omaha World-Herald the denial by Secretary of State Cordell Hull that no arrangement involving a 'military alliance of the four major nations permanently to coerce the world is contemplated or has ever been contemplated.' In a prepared statement honest, honorable and forthright, Cordell Hull said that any such fears on Mr. Dewey's part are 'utterly and completely unfounded.'"

Mr. Hull went further than that. The shaft Gov. Tom Dewey aimed was interpreted widely to refer to an unofficial Russian proposal. And since Russia was the target, Mr. Hull declared that the Moscow declaration, issuing from a Moscow Conference attended by Mr. Hull, resulted in the four nations—United States, Great Britain, Russia, and China—placing themselves on record as advocating a "general international organization * * * open to memberships of all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security."

Now, in the simplest language, is Cordell Hull lying about a matter as grave as this, or is Gov. Tom Dewey, the Republican candidate for the Presidency, campaigning to get a seat in the White House? Is old, rugged, blunt, and consistent Cordell Hull a cheap, sleezy liar, or is Tom Dewey shooting darts into the air to confuse and mislead the American people?

The American people have the plain, simple declaration of Secretary of State Cordell Hull that the resounding "No!" which Mr. Dewey uttered actually was a "No!" to a question that never existed and has never been considered. They have all this, and more, too. If they have the capacity to read, and the ability to remember, they will recall that the only authoritative, responsible suggestion made at any time during all these discussions of peace of military alliances between the United States and foreign powers was made by Gov. Tom Dewey himself in connection with Great Britain. And if they read and observed, they will recall Mr. Dewey dropped that one quicker than he would drop a steaming hot potato.

It may be an explanation why at this time he is so nervous about all talk of military alliances. It may shed light why the young man seems to be seeing ghosts that do not exist, and talking about specters that arise in his own mind.

All this is rather sad. All this borders on the fringes of a great national tragedy. All this revives the painful memory of American failure to discharge the responsibilities which the American people owed to their dead of World War No. 1 in the failure to mold from out of its sacrifices and its sorrows something of a durable peace.

In the early months of 1919, it was Henry Cabot Lodge. As a Member of the United States Senate, he called a Sunday morning breakfast weeks before the Versailles conference completed its labors, solidified Republican opposition, shaped the outlines for the Presidential campaign of 1920, and served notice, with the support of 36 colleagues, that in practical effect the Versailles conference should adjourn to the Senate Chamber for consultation with the late Senator Lodge and his Republican colleagues.

If Mr. Dewey insists upon talking, and he should talk as the nominee of his party, let him talk about things which are, instead of things which are not.

If Mr. Dewey insists upon talking, let him talk about things which are a logical and sensible basis for discussion, and not things which represent universal agreement among the American people.

Who is there in this country that objects to utter defeat of the tyrants? Who would dare to stick up his head or open his mouth in opposition to utter defeat of the tyrants? Who is there that is opposed to disarming Germany and Japan? Who is there at this time, when rich and decent American blood is being spilled on the earth's soil, that would object to disarming the military criminals that have sent thousands of American boys to their deaths? Who is there, beyond a small circle of irreconcilable isolationists, that objects to a permanent world organization? Who is there that suggests the smaller nations should not be represented in that organization—but who is there so silly—unless it is the Herald and Mr. Dewey—to believe that organization will have any vitality unless the larger, more powerful nations give it decent force?

Who is there of common intelligence that believes a world organization would mean anything without the inspired, unselfish, decent leadership of the great powers?

Once again, Mr. Dewey will do better when he gets down to facts.

Once again, Mr. Dewey will serve his party and the Nation to a far greater degree by telling what he does propose to do in acquiring the cooperation of Russia, Britain, and China, than by continuing to object.

Suppose these nations should not like every proposal Mr. Dewey has in mind.

Is that the end?

Resolution of the American Legion, Department of Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House of Representatives tc the fact that no capital ship of the United States Navy bears the name "Michigan."

The Michigan Department of the American Legion has adopted a resolution petitioning the Secretary of the Navy to direct that the next constructed battleship shall be called U. S. S. "Michigan." I heartily concur in this action and have written to the Secretary asking his favorable consideration of this suggestion.

Michigan's contribution to the war effor both in war materials and personnel has been enormous and it is only proper that the State should be so honored.

Under leave to extend my remarks I wish to include the text of the American Legion resolution on this matter:

Whereas the State of Michigan has contributed major quantities of war materials and personnel to our naval forces and will continue to do so; and

Whereas no capital ship of the United States Navy bears the name Michigan: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, Department of Michigan, petition the Secretary of the Navy to direct that the next constructed battleship shall be named U. S. S. Michigan, and it is further

Resolved, That a copy of this petition be forwarded to the Governor of the State of Michigan and to each Senator and Representative in the national Congress.

This resolution was duly adopted by the convention.

Turning Left

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence, from the Racine Journal-Times:

TURNING LEFT

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON.—The definite impression is growing here that President Roosevelt, in the event of reelection, will turn more to the left than ever before and will give during his fourth term the most radical administration of his entire career.

Many new reforms, the attainment of which has been interrupted by the war, will be sought. This pattern is forecast by new dealers who feel that whatever concessions Mr. Roosevelt may have felt it desirable to make to the southern Democrats in the last 2 years will become unnecessary during the fourth term.

The defeat of several southern Democratic conservatives, the stronger and stronger position politically being assumed by the C. I. O.—the principal ally of the Roosevelt administration—and the need for the creation of jobs for returning servicemen are all factors that are expected to be influential in the establishment of a planned economy.

Price control, modified somewhat from wartime but nevertheless sufficiently powerful to exert a penetrating effect on the operations of business and industry, would be continued, and there would be an effort to keep wages and salaries stabilized on the theory that this is essential in order to prevent inflation.

ADMINISTRATION'S POLICY

The adminstration's policy of securing maintenance-of-membership clauses in contracts of labor unions will be continued and the prospect is that many of these contracts will be converted into closed-shop arrangements under the economic coercion of strikes or threatened strikes.

The biggest single item in the reform program has been slumbering for the last three years. It concerns the cartel system in foreign trade. The administration is opposed, of course, only to cartels in which private businesses of this country are engaged. The new cartels would be government-managed so far as the United States is concerned.

The second item concerns the break-up of large industrial units in America. Many companies which have had a large volume of business in this war would find themselves under scrutiny. The pressure of antitrust lawsuits would be used to force what is to be called "competition."

Actually, however, a form of subsidized competition may come into being if the Roosevelt administration is continued in office. This means the use of Government funds and Government favors to assist certain units to compete with others. This may happen especially in the field of surplus property and war plants. The new dealers think that the "production for use" doctrines of the Socialist Party have some merit in them and that a system of government utilization of war plants to give employment would meet with support in Congress because of the widespread unemployment that may follow the cancellation of war contracts at the end of the war.

Thus the pressure to prevent cancelation could find employer and employee at the mercy of the administration in Washington. The idea that certain commodities should continue to be produced and that the surpluses should be bought by the Government or made available at lower prices in competition with already existing plants is one that has been bandied about here in the National Capital ever since December 1941 when war broke out. It has always been apparent that when the war was ended, the new dealers would wish in some way to influence prices and competition by causing the Government to hold surplus plants as a club over private enterprise.

Legislation governing surplus property and reemployment plans has not yet been worked out. The Senate and House may reach compromises but it is reported that President Roosevelt may veto the measure when it comes to him and demand something much more akin to the Murray-Kilgore bill.

The new dealers are frankly hopeful that a fourth term for Mr. Roosevelt will not only mean a resumption of the reform program but they are confident that by such a course the New Deal may expect to retain indefinitely its labor-union support which, if Mr. Roosevelt is reelected, will be given the major share of the credit for the victory at the polls. It looks like a period of economic and political disturbance is coming inside the United States the moment hostilities cease in Europe.

Paying the Costs of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, too many of the people of this Nation are entirely unmindful of the critical financial situation our Nation is in, and in which it will find itself when this war is over. While we willingly give all that is necessary for the prosecution of this war to final and complete victory, and that will continue until victory is ours, there are so many things that our Government must forego because of the terrific drain upon the resources of our Nation, and economy must be put into effect if we are to survive as a nation.

We do not hear of Winston Churchill planning to finance the world, when this war ends—because he is thinking of England. Stalin has made no statements that his country will either police or finance the other Nations when this war ends—because he is thinking of Russia. But, here, the President wants to finance the other countries of the world—because he fails to realize the situation our own country will face when this tragic war is over.

A very enlightening article recently appeared in the United States News, in which a comparison was made of the probable indebtedness of the various countries after this war is over, which I desire to extend in and as a part of my own remarks on this subject, and which article I hope the membership will read and give careful study.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the article to which I have referred, appearing in the United States News, of recent date, which article is as follows:

PAYING THE COSTS OF WAR—FINANCIAL BURDEN THREE TIMES THAT OF BRITAIN FACING POST-WAR UNITED STATES—MANAGEMENT OF DEFICIT, WITH $5,000,000,000 IN INTEREST YEARLY, A TASK FOR PLANNERS

The British are thinking and talking now about the economic plight in which the war will leave them. British spokesmen openly use the word "broke" to describe their condition.

At the same time, the world still thinks of the United States as a rich uncle. This country is pictured as rolling in riches without the financial problems that beset so many of the other nations.

A glance at a few debt figures, however, is beginning to cause some questioning of the basis for the tendency to draw a sharp contrast between the situation of this country and some other countries. America is going to have its troubles, along with the rest of the world. To illustrate:

BRITAIN

The national debt of Great Britain has risen from $33,600,000,000 (at $4 to the pound) in 1939 to what will be an estimated $93,000,000,000 by mid-1945. That is an increase of somewhat less than three times.

UNITED STATES

The national debt of this country has risen from $45,900,000,000 in 1939 to an estimated minimum of $250,000,000,000 by mid-1945. That is an increase of 5.5 times. It means that this country's debt, which was $12,000,000,000 greater than the British debt in 1939, has grown almost twice as fast during the war, and will be $157,000,000,000 greater before the war ends. By the end of the war our debt will be nearly three times the British debt.

This situation already is causing concern to the Government's experts whose job it is to handle the debt. They are getting set for the explanations they think Congress will soon be asking for. The first faint questioning already is being heard. There is bound to be a growing volume of questions as the subject is studied.

THE CAUSE

Britain's debt increase has been less rapid than that of the United States because: (1) British industry's productive capacity is smaller and Britain cannot spend as much as fast as this country; (2) Britain has taxed very heavily from the beginning, so that she has covered a larger percentage of her war spending with revenue; (3) lend-lease will add at least $35,000,000,000 to United States debt by mid-1945, of which at least $12,000,000,000 will represent aid to Britain.

THE EFFECT

After this war the United States Government will have by far the greatest debt in the world. The United States will lead the big-debt league. For the first time in American history this debt will be so large that it probably cannot be retired in substantial part and will call for interest payments to bondholders that are so large as to be a definite Budget problem. This interest cost soon will reach $5,000,000,000 a year and it may go to $6,000,000,000.

Even the sponsors of Federal Government pump priming admit that the public debt now is to involve a real problem in fiscal management and to raise a question whether the Nation can afford to have its debt continue to rise in the post-war years. The debt has been rising steadily since 1930 and each year of the rise the Federal Government has operated at a deficit. That is, the Government has spent more money than it has taken in.

It is true, however, that the debt problem of this country is not as great as that of the British because of some other factors. To illustrate:

DEBT AND POPULATION

The United State debt per capita will be $1,923 by mid-1945. The British debt per capita will be $2,022.

DEBT AND NATIONAL INCOME

It is the national income of a country that determines its ability to carry or pay off a debt. While the United States will wind up the war with a debt something like three times that of the British, this country's national income is running about four and one-half times that of the British, so that American ability to pay is somewhat greater.

INTERNAL VERSUS EXTERNAL DEBT

A debt that a country owes to its citizens is much easier to manage than a debt that is owed abroad. All the United States debt is internally held. The British owe as much as $12,000,000,000 abroad and must face the problem of finding foreign exchange or credits to meet that part of the debt.

But still the United States debt is of serious proportions and this country, like Britain, must find some way to manage it. The difference between the two countries is that Britain is recognizing what the Government must do in order to carry her debt. She is frankly facing the fact that the Government must support a high national income, must dig deeply into the taxpayer's pocket, and must keep a stable price structure. The British Government also has laid squarely before the people what this will mean in incomes and jobs and the future of every individual. The United States seems not yet convinced that it must face these facts now that it is at the head of the big-debt league.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER A. RAMEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, all of us have a general knowledge of the composition and functions of this vast military machine which we as a Nation have built during the course of a few short years—the monumental achievements of which will embellish the pages of history as a miracle of the rapid and efficient organization of the combined resources of a stalwart and determined people accelerated into high-speed action in an almost unbelievably short time—but few, if any, of us have had opportunity to observe in detail the multitudinous activities of this enormous machine which combine to make it the most efficient, effective and formidable fighting force the world has ever seen.

We are familiar with the more spectacular operations of this great and powerful military machine whose throttles now are wide open, forging ahead to victory on the battle fronts of the world. Most of us have a working knowledge of air and submarine warfare, some comprehension of the globe-encircling transportation and supply lines we are maintaining, and, as our casualties tragically mount, we are watching with keener interest and becoming more acutely aware of the marvelous efficiency, speed, and effectiveness with which the Medical Corps of both Army and Navy operate.

Today, however, I want to speak of a less spectacular but very important Army activity which, in my opinion, is one of many evidences of the thoroughness with which every need—tangible and intangible—of the personnel of our armed forces has been anticipated, planned for, and provided for. Over a recent weekend it was my privilege to visit the Army's School for Special and Morale Services at Lexington, Va., where I was particularly impressed with the work of the music section of the athletic and recreation branch of this school. To the music section come specially qualified officers and enlisted men, carefully selected from Army installations everywhere, who are given highly specialized training for a period of 1 month in the organization of vocal groups of all sizes and types—from large choirs right down to barber-shop quartettes.

These students are also taught how to encourage men to organize instrumental groups, ranging from large military bands down to hillbilly bands. Here they are trained how to encourage men in hospitals and rest areas to learn an instrument or at least to develop an interest in listening to music, all of which serves not only purposes of diversion and relaxation but frequently is a means of dissipating gloom and anxiety as well as distracting and diverting attention from physical injuries and ailments.

At this school I heard a splendid glee club, made up of men from the 24th class; from any representative group of battalion size such a glee club can be organized under the trained leadership of a graduate of this school. I also heard different small instrumental groups—a jazz band, a hillbilly band, and a moderated swing band, all expertly trained and performing with the smoothness and ease of seasoned professional artists.

One could visualize the graduates of this music section going forth to spread the healthy cheer and interest of song and music among our armed forces, relieving the boredom that so frequently has overtaken our troops in far distant places, as well as now and after the close of hostilities aiding in the soothing and restoration of war-weary nerves, chasing the cobwebs of gloom from war depressed minds, and lifting the spirits of battle-scarred servicemen and women into whose young lives have entered the shattering experiences of war.

The music section of the Army's School for Special and Morale Services is under the able direction of Lt. Col. Howard C. Bronson. Captain Walter Schumann, well known in both radio and theatrical fields for his splendid accomplishments, is in charge of the vocal work of the school, and Capt. Forrest McAllister is the Chief of the Soldier Music Section. These men are doing a thoroughly constructive piece of work and I am happy to take this opportunity to pay tribute to their fine efforts.

The Lawyer, the Constitution, and the Modern World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Friday, September 1), 1944

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, it was my privilege on the first of September to have the opportunity of speaking to the Indiana Bar Association at its forty-eighth annual meeting at Indianapolis, Ind. I ask that my remarks on that occasion may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My theme tonight is that industrial organization in the modern world has outrun the formulae by which, under law, the individual rights and opportunities of men are preserved, and that the lawyer of this age is presented with a task comparable to the one which confronted the framers of the Constitution. They knew how to preserve human rights and liberty while setting up a new and powerful National Government. They wrote the immutable principles of freedom into the Constitution at a time when the clashing interests of 13 discordant States threatened the orderly development of society.

There are clashing interests now, not among the States, but among economic classes. The relation of government to the organizations by which our economic life is dominated, the power of government over people, the authority of industrial management and of Government management, the relationship of labor, capital, and agriculture, all constitute an area in which legal concepts have not yet clearly crystalized. It is in this area that the lawyer must prove his capacity to understand and to preserve the public interest.

It has been said that this period in which we live, like the days in which the Constitution was drafted, is a time for greatness. Surely that is true for the members of this learned profession who know that the law is not only a rule by which commerce and industry may be carried on, but also a rule of democratic order under which people may live in security, and, in an atmosphere of freedom, make the most of the personal attributes of spirit, mind and body with which they have been endowed.

THE PEOPLE ARE THE SOURCE OF LAW

As lawyers we know that, according to our tradition and our most sacred beliefs, the law springs from the people themselves, and that there is no higher authority than the people. They are the source of all political power, but in this age we have seen the people lose control over their own affairs. We have seen an age of chaos, a chaos that has produced the most terrible war of all time, and all, primarily because leadership in business, in industry, in politics, has not understood how to adjust individual, human rights to the complexities of the modern world. To make this adjustment is the opportunity, and indeed the duty, of those who are members of our profession.

Consider for a moment the times in which we live. We have established a marvelously efficient national industrial organization operating on a national scale.

We have, through the National Government, coordinated these industrial groups into the most superlative technical organization for the production, transportation, and delivery of military power that was ever imagined.

Even before the Government stepped in to achieve this national organization of industrial might, we saw national economic organizations make gigantic strides in wealth and power. The great units which were created to carry on commerce and industry throughout the country were accompanied by the appearance of other national organizations. A national chamber of commerce came into being, and a score of national trade associations; organized labor formed itself into national groups; agriculture, the only occupation in the modern world still carried on for the most part by individuals in their individual capacity, was also organized on a national basis. Then followed national consumer groups, and national educational groups, and national organizations of practically every calling to which men turn.

EMPHASIS OF NATIONAL ORGANIZATION

This emphasis of the national scope of our existence has turned our attention away from the needs of the purely individual and local side of our natures. This side of society has been, as it were, overwhelmed by national and international development. Yet, as lawyers, we know that the principles of human freedom which lie at the root of all our political and legal concepts must lie also at the root of our economic concepts. We cannot have political freedom unless we preserve economic freedom. The two concepts are, as it were, opposite sides of the same shield. Capitalism and democracy are identical. Capitalism, basically, is the right of private property and by "private" property we mean individually owned property. Democracy, basically, is the right of the individual to control and direct the means by which he makes his livelihood, as well as the means by which he preserves order in the village, the county, the State, the Nation, yes; the whole world.

This is indeed a time for greatness, because this is no ordinary time. It is the most extraordinary the human race has experienced in perhaps a thousand years. In such times as these it is the duty of the lawyer to devote all his energies, all his learning, all his spiritual understanding to the great task of adjusting the concepts of law to the needs of the people in the complexities of national and international economic organization by which we are surrounded.

He is shortsighted, indeed, who imagines that this world crisis is only a military interlude after which law and living will revert to what they were before Hitler moved into Poland. The past is dead. We race forward toward a new world in which there will have to be a new adjustment of the people and the law. All through the history of mankind the basic duty of the lawyer has been to understand the relationship between the individual and the authority which governs him. Having understood that relationship, it has always been the lawyer's duty in times of crisis like this to help frame the law so as to preserve for the individual the maximum freedom consistent with good order and public welfare.

It would not be too much to say that this war is being fought because the lawyers of the last 50 years have not understood that the times were out of joint, and have not undertaken the task of protecting local and individual rights from the new authorities that were being called into existence by the astounding advances of science, engineering, and industry.

What I am saying is that in the modern world the scientist, the engineer, and the industrialist have taken leadership, but the lawyer has lagged behind. In the world of physics and chemistry, of science and invention, there has been almost unimaginable progress. But the law has not coupled human freedom to that progress. The achievements of science have been used by ambitious, power-hungry, and emotionally unstable men to crush mankind, to deprive the individual of liberty, and to establish arbitrary control. The lawyers, who as a class have not carried out their task of preserving the balance between men and authority, cannot escape their share of responsibility for the conditions that exist.

Does that sound like an exaggerated statement? Tell me then how did it come to pass that an Austrian paperhanger whose writings and speeches marked him by every standard of intelligence and culture as a man of mean attributes and gross philosophy almost made himself the master of the world? How did this impossible thing happen? It happened because people all over this globe, in their local communities, in their States, their nations, their empires, were unable to solve the personal problems of daily livelihood in a world in which science and invention, while creating new luxuries, had brought about such concentration of economic authority and such a lack of local and individual power, as to open wide the door to the political demagogue. It was the failure of business and political leadership to preserve a stable opportunity for the masses to earn a living that brought the authoritarian state into existence. The authoritarian state brought the war.

It could not have been otherwise, for once the principles of popular government were overthrown, and arbitrary power was established in Italy and Germany, the war of world conquest was inevitable, because the authoritarian state could not be safe until the principle of democracy had been utterly uprooted everywhere else.

LEADERSHIP AND THE LAWYER

As a profession, we lawyers did not comprehend what was happening and we took no steps to preserve the principles upon which our Constitution was founded, though they were being undermined before our very eyes. Now that victory in the war is certain, we can no longer postpone consideration of the problem of authority and the individual in the modern world. It is the very basis of post-war reconstruction. While maintaining all the gains of industrial organization, we must develop the formula by which to preserve, in economic as well as political organization, the principle of popular sovereignty that is the heart of the Federal Constitution.

We have the example of the men who drafted that instrument. It was the lawyers in the Constitutional Convention who planned and wrote that charter of individual freedom. There were 34 of them among the 55 delegates who attended. Ten of them had been judges. They were chosen not as representatives of the commercial class, but as representatives of the public. They were selected in the States by farmers, landowners, and traders in the colonial legislatures, who believed them to be the men best qualified to represent all groups and all interests. They were known as men of public spirit, rather than as the spokesmen of class interest.

I emphasize this aspect of their service because so many lawyers in our time are regarded as the spokesmen of special groups, and because there is so great a tendency nowadays to classify men, not as citizens of the Republic, but according to their economic interest—business, agriculture, labor, and so on through all the pressure groups which on a national scale serve special interests instead of public interest. The men who drew the preamble of the Constitution were not thinking in terms of special classes or of class government. They were thinking of the people as a whole. They were thinking of justice, of domestic tranquillity, of the common defense and general welfare. They were trying to erect a government that would "secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity" that is to say for all the individuals who then constituted, and in the days to come, would constitute the people of this great Nation.

Then, when the First Congress assembled, this objective was made even more clear by the adoption of the Bill of Rights. This again was the work of lawyers who understood the deep public significance of the new government and how important it was for the preservation of freedom to leave no doubt that the people were the source of authority, that the new government was being created to serve but not to rule them.

LAWYERS AND THE BILL OF RIGHTS

These men who gave us the Constitution knew from intimate experience precisely what they were trying to do. They had seen a king attempt to rule by the exercise of arbitrary central authority, authority they were expected to obey but which they were not permitted to direct. The lawyers of 1789, animated by a patriotic public spirit, labored to erect a government which derived its sanction from the will of all the people, not from any part of them. It is true, of course, that the business interests of the Colonies were enthusiastically active in the campaign for ratification, but that was not because they thought the new Constitution would set up a businessman's government. They knew better because they had joined in the promise that a bill of rights would be adopted. They worked for ratification because they knew it would be good for business and for all vocations to have a stable government designed to safeguard the public welfare by protecting fundamental human rights.

The Bill of Rights was an assertion of the sovereignty of the people as individuals over the organizations they create. It was an unmistakable declaration of their authority over government. It could not have been otherwise, therefore, than an assertion of their authority over every subordinate organization as well. But more of that later.

IMPORTANCE OF LOCAL AUTHORITY

Let me here invite attention to another lesson that may be drawn from the Constitution. One of its greatest virtues is to be found in the delicate balance it established between the local and the national powers of government. It is true, as Charles Warren, the distinguished modern authority on the Constitution points out in his book, The Making of the Constitution, that the members of the Convention were filled with the purpose of forming a strong central government. "One cannot fail to be impressed," he writes, "with the fact that the burning desire and insistent determination pervading them was that the union of the States must be preserved and that all legislative or other conditions prevailing in the States which were impeding or undermining this possibility of union must be remedied in any new form of government that might be developed."

It was also true, however, that the advocates of a strong central government joined the opponents of that idea in defense of the rights of the individual as against the Government. "The desire to protect individual rights (whether of property or otherwise, whether of the rich or poor) against governmental injustice was shared by leaders of thought on both sides," Warren tells us.

The lawyers of the Constitutional Convention saw both sides. Knowing that they were building a national government for people who nevertheless lived and earned their livelihood in local communities, they drafted an instrument that was designed to preserve to the States and to the people full authority over local and State concerns, while vesting in the National Government full authority over those concerns which affect the Nation as a whole. This elementary distinction between State and Federal power is known, of course, to every lawyer, but it cannot be said that every lawyer nowadays applied the cold logic of that distinction to the economic questions of the hour as John Marshall did to the economic problems of his time. It was that great Chief Justice himself who defined the scope of the commerce clause as embracing even wholly intrastate business transactions when they "affected more States than one," a doctrine which many a briefholder for national business would like to toss aside if possible, in our time.

CAUSE OF FEDERAL EXPANSION

The expansion of the Federal power which we have witnessed during this century has not been the result primarily of the efforts of those who would create a stronger central government than that created by the framers of the Constitution and later perpetuated by judicial construction and by force of arms. The expansion of Federal power in our time has been due almost exclusively to the expansion of national commerce. That expansion, in turn, has been due to the fact that science and invention have utterly altered our world and have completely eradicated the geographical boundaries by which business was confined when the Constitution was written.

The devastating speed with which science has advanced is scarcely comprehended even by those of us who have witnessed its greatest strides. Certainly we have not clearly perceived the dislocations of local and individual economic authority it has caused. Thirty-five years ago, when I went West, the airplane was still in the experimental or demonstration stage. It was not an instrument of commerce. At the beginning of this century there was no such thing as an automobile highway. The traveler who would venture 100 miles from home in the motor car of that era was an intrepid adventurer. Radio was undreamed of and though the telephone was a thriving success and in constant use for local business, the coast-to-coast and international phone conversations of our time never entered even the dreams of the average person.

During the less than 3 years since we entered this war, science has leaped forward again. We made the landings in Normandy and we are sweeping the Germans back to their own frontiers, because our engineers have accomplished physical wonders beyond even the capacity of the scientific Teutons. Tojo, who in December 1941 felt certain that Tokyo was beyond all possibility of danger from the enemy he dared to challenge, has fallen from power because the American B–29 has almost abolished distance.

These are the things that have built up central power. Science has extended the radius through which men can exercise their influence. Measured in terms of transportation and communication, the globe today is, in size, only a fraction of the globe into which every man in this room was born.

INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATION

More than that, the instruments that we use, the services we demand, even the entertainment upon which we insist can be produced and supplied only by huge organizations of men and capital.

Consider the invasion of Normandy. There were 13,000 seagoing craft in the English Channel that memorable 6th of June, and 17,000 aviators were overhead, in I know not how many aircraft, furnishing an air umbrella for the tens of thousands of boys who went ashore with other thousands of jeeps and tanks and even bulldozers. They tell me that the paper in which were drawn the countless maps that were needed for the operation weighed more than 100 tons.

All of this was the product of organization of which the eighteenth century had no conception. It tells the story of the coordinated activities of literally millions of men. It was possible only because before the war we had industrial and business organization that was completely beyond the scope and jurisdiction of merely local governing authority. To perform this miracle of science and industry by which we are overwhelming Hitler, we had to have the central coordinating power of government in a degree never before conceived, save by the totalitarians. It was possible here and in Britain only because a high degree of central power had already been developed in industry before central government itself had begun to grow.

This is the modern world of which I speak, the modern world of highly concentrated economic power in which it is the task of the lawyer to preserve the constitutional right of the individual to live freely and pursue his own happiness in his own way. This is the world in which is posed again the delicate problem of adjusting necessary government authority in such a manner as not to destroy or impair either the economic or the political freedom of the individual citizens.

INDIVIDUAL ECONOMY SUBMERGED

Members of the profession of law will miss the whole meaning of the modern crisis if they fail to realize that local business has been submerged by national business. It is this submergence of our purely local and individual economy in the organized national economy that is the most vital factor of the modern crisis.

The State of New York is the richest and most powerful State in the Union. It gross revenues in 1942 amounted to a little more than $720,000,000. Yet that same year the Pennsylvania Railroad took in more than $838,000,000, the General Electric Co. more than $913,000,000, the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Co. more than $1,378,000,000, the American Telephone and Telegraph Co. almost $1,500,000,000, United States Steel almost $1,900,000,000, and General Motors $2,250,548,859.

Each of the last three has in excess of 300,000 employees. If you were to count their stockholders also and take into consideration the families of the employees, you would realize that each of these giants is an economic state with a population of more than a million. Every one of a hundred national corporations is more wealthy and powerful than most States and practically all cities. Only the Federal Government can cope with them.

Yet when you read the law books, you will find the courts using the simple personal pronoun in referring to these gigantic economic entities as thought they were flesh and blood persons instead of collectivist organizations. Here, for example, is a sentence taken from an opinion of Justice Holmes in a case involving two wealthy corporations engaged in the manufacture of chewing gum. They were litigating an accounting arising from a patent infringement. "It would be unjust," writes the great justice of the corporate litigants, "to charge an infringer with the gross amount of his sales without allowing him for the materials and labor that were necessary * * * but it does not follow that he should be allowed what he paid for the chance to do what he knew that he had no right to do." The same habit of personalizing the huge corporate organizations of the day is followed in Congress. The debate on the surplus property bill now under consideration is full of "hes" and "hims" that refer not to persons, but to the huge corporate units which outfitted the Nation for this, the greatest war of all time.

CORPORATE PERSON VERSUS NATURAL PERSON

It is this fantastic confusion of the corporate person with the natural person which has made it so difficult for many a legal mind to comprehend what has been happening to our local and individual economy. If we insist upon thinking of an economic state as a natural person, it will be difficult if not impossible for us to preserve the balance which the constitutional fathers established. When they performed their monumental public service, most business and commerce was purely local and purely personal. The people who inhabited the original States supported themselves working with or from their neighbors, and communities were economically independent. This was the foundation of democracy. Economic authority and political authority were coextensive. But we have lived to see a great change. Economic authority has moved out of the local community to the financial centers of the Nation.

When the managers of a billion-dollar corporate giant alter a production policy, millions of people in thousands of communities all across the country are affected. Jobs are made and unmade not only for the thousands employed by the giants but by other thousands employed by other businesses in affected communities. Grocers and haberdashers, doctors, and even lawyers in every State experience a change of economic status when a board of directors sitting in New York decides, for example, to curb expenditures, for reasons that are good and sufficient for the corporation. Yet they can do nothing about it. If they try through the State legislature, or the city council, it is not unlikely that they will find that the best local lawyers have been retained by the foreign corporation and are appearing before the local lawmakers to protect the corporate rather than the community interest. It is not at all unusual to run across the lawyer who, in all sincerity, talks of personal rights and individualism while serving the modern collectivist economic state.

It is this disappearance of local economic independence that is destroying the foundations of democracy much more than the machinations of agitators or politicians. If there had been no economic instability in Germany, Hitler could not have overthrown the Weimar republic.

PEOPLE ARE SUPERIOR TO ORGANIZATIONS

This is not to say that the huge corporate organization is an evil, for it is not. It is absolutely essential in the modern world, but so also is the independent local community; so also, above all, is the economically independent individual citizen. It was he the authors of the Bill of Rights had in mind when they wrote the charter of personal liberty. When they made the people masters of the Government, surely they did not intend that the people should not also be masters of those national economic organizations, corporate and unincorporated, which, after all, though they dominate the economic destinies of the people, are, nevertheless, mere creatures of man.

As we move now toward the complete collapse of our enemies in this war, we do so bearing a national debt that amounts at this moment to more than $208,000,000,000, or $1,540 for every man, woman, and child of our 135,000,000 people. The income of our people has, it is true, reached unprecedented heights—one hundred and fifty-eight billions—but it is based on Government expenditures. The Federal Government has been buying with deficit dollars 50 percent of all goods and services produced in the country. These purchases are for purposes of war. When peace comes and war purchases stop, production will cease, with consequent disaster to us all unless we find a new market for our tremendous productive capacity.

SOCIAL AND INDIVIDUAL ECONOMY ESSENTIAL

Where is this new market to be found? It will be found in the revitalization of our local communities, in the stimulation of renewed local and State pride, in the reestablishment of the local economy, and, above all, in the maintenance of a high standard of living for all. The expanded purchasing power of the masses alone can take the place of Government spending, if we want to maintain a democratic economy and the institution of private property.

We dare not rely on big national business alone. These organizations are not so constituted as to serve the general public interest except in the narrow field of their own operations. They are concerned with their own success in interstate commerce rather than with the success of all commerce or with the success of any purely local business.

We must develop the formula by which national commerce and local commerce may exist side by side, each performing its own function. The development of this formula is distinctly a task for the lawyer, for it will be a rule of law. It cannot be found in a test tube in the chemist's laboratory. The engineer cannot calculate it on a slide rule. The businessman cannot find it in his ledger. But the lawyer can find it if only he will cast aside his prejudices, and in his local community, emulating the example of his predecessors of the eighteenth century, seek again in his books those immutable principles of human justice which in every crisis of the past have helped mankind forward.

THE PEOPLE WILL PREVAIL

Make no mistake about it, the people will prevail. Nothing can stop their onward sweep.

Who did not feel a tightening of the throat when he read of the liberation of Paris? The jubilation on the streets, the wild joy with which our soldiers were greeted, the embraces and kisses that were showered upon them were all the manifestation of a people who knew that once more they were free, that once more they were at liberty to handle their affairs without constraint from any outside authority.

We set them free—we and our allies. Here, indeed, do we see again "a new birth of freedom," for all the peoples of the world. To make it live and thrive and spread—that is a problem of government and of law. Let the lawyer then take up his task. Let him go back to his own community and there among his neighbors in every walk of life, seek to build anew the foundations of democracy. Let him realize that the victory of organized might in this global war will not be complete until individual economic freedom has been established in every State, city, and county in which people live. Let him absorb anew that spirit of public service which filled the hearts of the lawyers who wrote the Constitution. Then will he open new horizons of freedom for all mankind.

Let the Facts Be Known

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the people of my district are asking why Admiral Kimmel and General Short have not been court-martialed. In my opinion, the answer is because the administration is afraid to let the facts be known. The people remember that immediately after the catastrophe at Pearl Harbor, they were told that charges had been filed against Kimmel and Short. Now it develops that court-martial proceedings have never been started against them. No charges against them have ever been filed. Efforts have been made by the Congress to have charges filed and to have these charges tried, but nothing has been done except the recent announcement that an investigation is being made to determine if charges should be filed. Why the investigation? The Commander in Chief was their superior officer. He surely knows whether they disobeyed his orders or not. Kimmel and Short have been trying to get something done in their case so the public could know the facts. They claim a court-martial trial will absolve them of all blame. Admiral Kimmel says that when the entire story is given to the American people they will be "amazed at the truth." I think this is correct and that the real reason no action has been taken is because the blame lies much higher than Admiral Kimmel and General Short, and that the administration does not dare let the truth be known before the election.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress and the people should continue to demand an immediate hearing so that the people can definitely know who was responsible for our disastrous defeat at Pearl Harbor, and for the loss of over 2,300 lives and practically all of our Pacific Fleet, which permitted the Japs to capture the Philippines and extend their conquest to Hong Kong, Singapore, and through the Pacific. If action is not had now, there is no reason to believe that the facts will ever become known as long as President Roosevelt remains Commander in Chief. There is no reason to believe that, if he is successful in his fourth term effort, he will not run for as many terms as his span of life will permit.

It is not just a coincidence that after the elapse of 3 years the President should suddenly decide to visit Hawaii. Many over there undoubtedly know the facts about Pearl Harbor and an election is soon to be had. Undoubtedly, there is much "fence building" to be done in that territory.

Many inquiries have come to my office asking how much the President's junket and fishing trip to Hawaii and the Aleutians cost; how many battleships, cruisers, destroyers, and carriers this trip took out of the fighting lines, and how long the immobilization of these naval forces would prolong the war. It is impossible to get information to answer these inquiries. It has been stated that the cost to the taxpayers was $20,000,000, but the number and kind of naval units taken out of action remains "a military secret," and there is no way to tell how long the war will be prolonged by reason of this trip.

Upon returning to Bremerton the President made a speech. The Socialist Party claimed it was political and demanded equal radio time. The Army ruled the speech was political and granted the Socialist Party the radio time requested. Then, mysterious things began to happen, and 6 hours later the Army reversed itself and held the speech was not political. I think everyone who heard the speech will have no hesitancy in saying that it was political. In fact, the trip was political. This calls to mind the trips the President made to war plants, and his speeches in the 1940 campaign. It is a peculiar coincidence that these trips and speeches came during a political campaign. Recently, I talked to the head of one of the great war material producing industries which was visited by the President on a so-called inspection trip of defense industries in October of 1940. He told me that this inspection trip knocked his plant out of about 1 week's production. This great steel mill was required to stop production, to turn the workshop into a show place, to move at least one of every article it produced, and place these articles along the route which the President would travel while riding through the plant. At the appointed time the President's automobile came through the plant, but the President did not look at any of the articles produced by the plant, he was busy waving and nodding his head at the workmen, who were required to keep at least 50 feet away from the Presidential party. When the Presidential party departed, the workmen were required to move the various articles back to the stockrooms and then put the plant into operation. This caused this great steel mill to lose about 1 week's total production. Everyone knows that this trip did not and could not help in the least in getting production, but was purely political.

A few nights ago I attended a moving-picture show where the current events showed General MacArthur explaining the Pacific strategy to the President. It was noticeable that Admiral King and General Marshall were not present. The war strategy is planned by the military and naval heads, although there have been attempts made to make the people believe this strategy is planned by the President. I think the President's political acumen slipped, when, in an unguarded moment, he permitted pictures to be taken, showing General MacArthur explaining the Pacific war strategy to him. No doubt there will be many more similar trips before the election, unless the President senses the unfavorable public reaction to such junkets.

Mr. Speaker, there should be a complete congressional investigation of the case of Tyler Kent, the State Department employee assigned to our Embassy in England, whose duty it was to encode and decode messages sent under our private code. He handled the messages between the President and Mr. Churchill, who for some reason which has never been explained, had been permitted to use our secret code. These messages were sent in 1939, before the war, and while Churchill was First Lord of the Admiralty, and while Chamberlain was Prime Minister.

The matter was first exposed in the House of Parliament, where it was charged that in these messages President Roosevelt assured Churchill that if England went to war, the United States would come to England's rescue; that a message from Churchill to Roosevelt states, "should I become Prime Minister we can control the world"; that the messages contained many uncomplimentary and disparaging remarks about Joe Stalin; that Mr. Kent took these messages to his room and made photostatic copies, which he showed to Captain Ramsay, a Member of Parliament, and also to a Russian woman who is presumed to have communicated them to Stalin, which probably accounts for Stalin's procedure at the start of the war.

Kent was arrested and charged with embezzling secret messages from the American Embassy—was tried in a secret British court and sentenced to 7 years in prison. Captain Ramsay has been detained in custody because he has knowledge of the matter.

The story of this matter was first published in the press on November 12, 1941. At that time the White House professed to have no knowledge upon the subject. Recently the matter was fully discussed in the British Parliament and the stories on this discussion were passed by the British censors and were published in the United States press. The matter was fully discussed in the Congress, and only when the public became interested and demand for an investigation made, did the State Department say anything about it. It is interesting to note that neither Mr. Churchill or any Member of the British Parliament, nor Mr. Roosevelt or any member of the State Department have ever denied that Mr. Churchill was given our secret code in order to communicate directly with the President before he became prime minister, nor that the messages as above mentioned were sent.

I am not in any way defending Kent's actions, but mention this matter for the sole purpose of comparing what had actually taken place and the commitments made by the President, with his statements on the eve of the 1940 election when he made his now famous "again and again and again" speech telling mothers and fathers that their sons would not be sent to fight on foreign soil. This matter should be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. Speaker, it now looks as if complete victory is about to be had, and we all hope and pray that this victory will come real soon, so that our boys and girls can return to their homes and loved ones.

We are winning the war because we have the best generals and admirals in the world, who have planned our strategy, provided for proper training of our forces, and secured the proper equipment and implements of war; because we have the best Army and Navy in the world; because of the productive capacity of American industry; because American labor has gone into the mills, factories, and mines and produced the war materials needed; because the American farmers, although unable to get farm machinery and equipment they need, while enormous quantities of this needed farm machinery have been sent all over the world to farmers of other countries, and with farm manpower greatly curtailed, have produced the necessary food; and, because the American taxpayers and bond buyers have produced the finances. All these elements have made a great team which is winning the war, and this team will bring the war to a victorious end regardless of who is elected President on November 7.

When the war is over, the boys and girls in service want to come back to a free United States and to a Government under the Constitution. They want to pick up life where they left off when they entered the service, and to have an opportunity for free private employment at good wages, and to enjoy the liberty and blessings of our system of Government, which they have so valiantly fought, and many died, to preserve.

They do not want their country to be run by Earl Browder, Harry Bridges, or Sidney Hillman, or by anyone else who is dominated by them. They know that the Communist National Convention, which was held long before the New Deal Convention, unanimously voted not to run a candidate for President on its ticket this year, but unanimously voted to support President Roosevelt for a fourth term, as the candidate meeting its approval. This shows conclusively that the Communists think pretty well of President Roosevelt and that he is satisfactory to them. No doubt they have an understanding. The New Deal Convention simply ratified what the Communist Party had done, although the New Deal's Convention action was not unanimous. The New Deal 4–H Club, Hillman, Hopkins, Hannegan, and Hague, together with other big city bosses such as Kelley and the Pendergast machine, have joined with the Communists, and they have all joined hands for a fourth term.

Harry Hopkins has been kept in the background for quite a while, but he still occupies the same positions of influence. Sidney Hillman must have quite an influence with the President as shown when the President required that the Vice Presidential candidate must be approved by Hillman. The President's statement to Hannegan to "clear it through Sidney" will be heard about many times. I wonder what else must be cleared through Sidney.

We all know we cannot continue under the New Deal and the philosophies of Earl Browder, Harry Bridges, and Sidney Hillman and remain a free, independent, and prosperous people. It is the intent of the new dealers to completely regiment the American people; they have no idea of relinquishing any controls now exercised after the war is over but, instead, they intend to make the controls more stringent. It is the opinion of those who are "in the know" that the President will turn decidedly to the "left" if he is reelected, and in that event his fourth term would be more radical; that he and his "planless planners" would provide a complete system of planned economy to govern us. The Congress is the only agency today not under the administration's control, and this probably accounts for the anti-Congress triades of the New Deal. If the New Deal again takes control of Congress, the United States as you and I have known it will no longer exist.

Our forefathers braved the perils of an uncharted course across the ocean to settle in this new land; they wanted economic and political freedom; they wrote the Declaration of Independence; they fought a long, hard war, and many of them died that their dream of liberty and freedom might be established in a government; they wrote the Constitution of the United States, and the Bill of Rights, and established the Government of the United States of America. From the time they landed upon our shores, up to the present hour, American manhood has been ready and willing to fight, and to die, to preserve this form of government and to protect the liberties and freedoms under our form of government.

It has been said that if Hitler should win the war, he would destroy our form of government, and in that event life would not be worth living. Actually, it would make little difference whether Hitler, Mussolini, Tojo, or "Joe Blow" destroyed our form of government, the result would be the same.

We are engaged in a mighty war against foreign foes to preserve our form of government. We could lose our form of government from within, and we should be just as alert against those within our borders who would destroy it as against those without our borders. A form of government which is worth fighting against foreign foes to preserve, as many of the flower of American manhood are doing today, surely is worth voting for so as to make sure that it is not destroyed from within, and when we have done this I feel sure that when the boys come home after victory they will be happy that we have saved here that which they were fighting for over there. We will have protected and preserved against the enemies from within what they have protected and preserved against the enemies from without.

Every effort should be made to bring about an understanding and cooperation between the nations of the world which will insure a lasting peace. This enduring peace must be built upon a solid foundation of truth and fairness, and cannot be established by secret intrigue. Our Nation should do everything possible to bring about this understanding and cooperation among the nations of the world. We must make sure that no one can ever again get enough power that in his lust for world conquest he could array nations against nations in another world war.

An American Ideal in Action

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an article, I am anxious to call the attention of my colleagues to the national scope of the work that the better business bureaus are doing. Today there are about 80 better business bureaus in active operation throughout the country, located in practically every State. These organizations are supported by business for the benefit of business and the protection of the purchasing public. They are nonpolitical, but they work in active cooperation with the constituted authorities.

In the enclosed article, An American Ideal in Action, Miss Elizabeth Frazer has well explained the work of these organizations. Miss Frazer is an experienced writer, well known to the American reading public. In World War No. 1 she was a war correspondent in Europe for the Saturday Evening Post and has written many articles on business, finance, and economics, which have appeared in Good Housekeeping, the Saturday Evening Post, and other national magazines. She is an author of no mean reputation and perhaps the best known of her books is A Woman and Her Money.

I hope my colleagues in the House will read this article and will support the work of the better business bureau wherever possible. They are bound to play an important part in the reconversion period, particularly in the disposition of surplus Government goods.

AN AMERICAN IDEAL IN ACTION

(By Elizabeth Frazer)

They are not Government bureaus—although their main function is the protection of the public and their services are free. They are non-profit organizations. They neither buy nor sell. They have no legislative activities; no political ax to grind; no ideological propaganda to promulgate—unless a belief that honesty should prevail in business transactions can be called an ideological slant. In which case, the people have cast their ballots in its favor, for Mr. and Mrs. Average American, by hundreds of thousands each year, have beaten a broad path to their doors.

Located in the chief business centers of the country, the work of these 80 bureaus covers a vast field of everyday business transactions which touch every household—securities, real estate, services, and all kinds of merchandise. Most of their work is carried on without fanfare, and it is doubtful if even the people who use them know what they are all about. And yet these 80 bureaus house an American ideal in action which is one of the most constructive forces shaping the whole pattern of business conduct in this country today. Let us look at some of these activities and see what actually goes on.

Telephones were ringing in the offices of the better business bureau. A steady trickle of callers entered. Housewives, businessmen, law enforcement officials. At his desk, a man we will call Mr. Moore, head of his section, received callers and answered the phone. First of all, I talked with the manager of the bureau.

"In order to get a clear picture of the work of these bureaus," he said, "we'd better peg down a few fundamental facts. Our whole work is based on an ideal. It's a typically American ideal of self-government. Of regulations and restraints imposed, not from the outside, but voluntarily from the inside. These bureaus are an integral part of business itself, set up for the express purpose of promoting truth, accuracy, and fair play in everyday business transactions. Business itself supports us to investigate fraud, misrepresentations, or sharp selling practices, to establish the true facts, and then act without fear or favor in the public interest."

To sample some of these activities, I sat by Mr. Moore's desk. A sailor was ushered in. He had bought a silver bracelet which the salesman had told him was sterling, but an appraiser to whom he had taken it said he had been gypped. He wanted his money back. Mr. Moore examined the bracelet and the sales slip. "If we get a refund, where shall we send it?" he asked. The sailor gave his mother's address. Mr. Moore rang for an investigator. "Take this bracelet and sales slip to that jeweler. Get hold of the owner. Ask him to explain."

Later in the day the investigator returned with a duplicate copy of the jeweler's letter to the boy's mother, expressing regret for the error, due to an inexperienced clerk. A check for the full amount had been enclosed to her.

Again the telephone rang. The credit department of a bank wanted information on the business record of a man we will call Jones. "Hold the wire," said Mr. Moore. "I'll look at our files."

These files are unique. They contain factual information on the business practices of individuals and companies collected over the years and are further supplemented by data from other bureaus. The librarian produced a folder on Jones. Mr. Moore read aloud from its contents into the phone. No comment. No opinion. Just the bare factual record. But that record was conclusive. Hearing it, no bank would lend Jones a dime. The credit department of the bank hung up. Then Mr. Moore explained how the files are built up.

"This Mr. Jones, let us say, comes to town and starts a store. And now Jones begins to write his own history. Complaints about him begin to come in. We investigate these complaints. We get both sides of the story. For experience has shown us that the customer is not always right. So we carefully examine all the facts. If the complaint was not justified, our records show that fact. Or perhaps it was just some slight error which Jones corrects and the customer is satisfied. But suppose Jones refuses to make good on a bona fide grievance which our impartial investigation shows was justified. Complaints from the public continue. Again we investigate, and again we take the matter up with Jones, giving him ample opportunity to correct his bad practices voluntarily. If persuasion fails we take our findings to the law-enforcement authorities and our files contain the law's verdict. The complete factual record is there. Then one day Jones asks the bank for a loan and the bank phones us for information on his business record, for our reliability as an impartial, fact-finding agency is well known. And now Jones' history which he wrote himself has caught up with him."

The work of the better business bureaus has two aspects. On one hand they act as guardians of the public to protect citizens from fraud, misrepresentations, and sharp-selling practices. On the other hand, they collaborate with business itself to promote high standards of truth and accuracy and to evolve practical machinery so that these standards can be put into actual operation. The bureaus have fashioned many instruments to implement the principles of truth and accuracy in business transactions. One of the most important of these is the fair practice code called the guide for retail advertising and selling. This guide contains standards, rules, definitions, and recommendations on how to describe properly almost every article sold at retail. It is used by all leading stores, newspapers, radio stations, and advertising agencies in cities in which the bureaus operate. It has a Nation-wide scope.

"But that is not all," said the manager of one bureau. "Constant changes are going on and we keep retailers acquainted with these changes. We also maintain a copy consultant department so that any manufacturer, retailer, publisher, or radio station may call us up anytime. Every day retailers ring us up asking for accurate descriptions of the goods on their shelves. Often they themselves do not know what an article is actually composed of or how to describe it truthfully. So they apply to us. We may not always know. But when we don't, we find out. In addition, we scan carefully all store advertisements in the daily papers and when we find any that look suspicious, we check them for investigation. This work covers not only legitimate companies, but also the vicious outer fringe of unscrupulous concerns which exploit the public and destroy fair competition.

"The experience of all the bureaus shows that the vast majority of business firms are honest. They want to do what is right. That does not mean they don't make mistakes. It does mean they correct those mistakes. Voluntarily. Figures in our files show that out of the whole number of bona fide grievances received each year, the overwhelming majority are settled voluntarily to the satisfaction of both parties."

To obtain an objective point of view on the work of those bureaus I interviewed lawyers, bankers, Federal authorities and police officials. A high executive in a great department store said:

"I cannot conceive doing business in a large city without a better business bureau. Let us visualize such a picture. In the first place, that city would be the roosting-place of all manner of racketeers, and the unscrupulous outer fringe of business without ethical responsibility would increase to dangerous proportions. But that is not all. Legitimate business itself would suffer. Let us take, for example, the retail trade. This is a highly competitive field. One merchant, let us say, makes untrue or exaggerated claims. His competitors, naturally, want him to stop. If he can't be stopped, some competitors may try to go him one better, and thus an unhealthy condition arises. Public confidence is impaired. And public confidence is the very taproot of existence in business; it is the most precious asset in the world. So we must have some agency that is fair, impartial, and respected by all to point out the bad plays. The decisions of that agency must be based, not on mere opinion, but on solid facts. It must always act in the best interest of the public and treat everybody alike. These three things: curbing fraudulent business, checking in the public interest and checking impartially on everybody alike are what make these bureaus valuable instruments of voluntary regulation, highly necessary in modern business life."

In their constructive work with business and the settlement of complaints the Bureaus have a very flexible method of procedure. If investigation shows that the complaint is justified the bureau takes up the matter directly with the owner or the proper executives of the company.

"In this part of our work," the manager of one bureau explained, "we are very careful, very patient. What we are trying to do is to develop a better spirit, a feeling of ethical responsibility. So our method is not a cracking-down from the outside but a building-up, brick by brick, from the inside. This first step in our procedure—taking up the matter directly with the owner or executive in charge—is successful in a great majority of cases. If, however, it fails, we may take the results of our investigation to the newspapers or radio stations which carry the company's advertising. They have their own high standards to maintain and are usually very cooperative in getting the bad advertising corrected or, in aggravated cases, in refusing to carry it. As a last resort, if other methods fail, we bring the results of our investigations to the law enforcement authorities. And here again we follow straight through, take the witness stand when necessary, and record the verdict in our files."

The war added many new duties to the normal activities of the bureaus. Acting as a liaison agent between Government and business and respected by both for their unswerving devotion to the public interest, they were able to achieve successful results on the basis of voluntary cooperation through the self-regulation of business itself.

Ever since their initiation the bureaus have waged a relentless warfare against swindlers, stock crooks, and promoters of devious schemes, cooperating heartily with the Securities and Exchange Commission and the postal authorities in their fraud-fighting activities. Frequently a bureau, with its broad experience, is able to detect a well-planned pattern of fraud operating through a wide territory, which to the untrained eye appears like an isolated case. This sixth sense in fraud detection has saved the public millions of dollars.

"Of course," said the manager of one bureau, "we don't catch everything. We're not supermen. But we've had a lot of experience. Our fraud-fighting program has two aspects. First, we work to prevent fraud. We try to stamp it out before it gets started. The bureaus join hands when a problem is regional, and we often know beforehand when some fraudulent scheme is headed our way and can take effective measures against it. The second aspect of this fraud-fighting work is our educational program. Through publicity, radio talks, articles, and leaflets we try to educate citizens to recognize the earmarks of rackets and, above all, before they invest their savings to investigate thoroughly."

Another important activity which the bureaus have carried on through the years is a broad program of education designed to aid citizens in the management of their everyday business affairs. Fact booklets give basic information on subjects of practical interest to the average household, such as borrowing, budgeting, buying, or building a home, life insurance, legal problems, and savings.

Eighty of these better business bureaus operate in the principal centers of the country, serving the needs of their own communities and cooperating with each other. Each bureau is supported by annual subscriptions from members who represent a cross section of the entire business community. The president and board of directors are representative businessmen, serving without compensation. The actual operation of each organization is in charge of a paid manager. The bureaus cannot recommend or sponsor any company or product, and membership in them cannot be used for commercial advantage or to gain consumer good will. The National Better Business Bureau is also a fact-finding, fraud-fighting organization to promote high standards in business on a national scale.

The work of these bureaus throughout the country goes on quietly, steadily. The detailed picture of their daily activities reveals a lot of little things. Little wrongs righted; little corrections made. More good feeling; more good faith; more confidence all around. And it all adds up to something rather splendid. It is the democratic process in action. Self-government in business. Self-imposed restraints.

"It is one thing," Woodrow Wilson said, "to entertain fine principles, and it is another thing to make them work."

The better business bureaus of this country are making fine principles work.

Senator George Norris

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, Senator Norris' death a few days ago removed one of the outstanding statesmen of this generation. Whether you agreed with him or not you could but admire his courage, and his far-seeing vision, and he accomplished much for the rights of the common man during his 40 years of service in the Congress of the United States.

An editorial in the New York Times yesterday pays tribute to him, and under leave granted, same is submitted herewith:

SENATOR NORRIS

George Norris was one of the last of the elder statesmen. Probably no Senator in his time left a deeper impress on a changing America. He stood like a rock dividing the liberal and conservative streams of thought in this Nation, diverting much of it into the channels through which he wished it to flow. That was always to the left, always toward what he felt was the side of the common man and against what he felt was entrenched privilege. He was uncompromising and incorruptible. The possible dangers that lurked in a socialized society he ignored. In his last days, accepting the honorary chairmanship of Sidney Hillman's Political Action Committee, he stood further to the left than he had ever before ventured.

The end of his life was saddened by his defeat for the Senate in 1942. He regarded it as a "repudiation of 40 years of service" by "the people I love." But most of the reforms for which he fought so stoutly were already incorporated in our political system, and his place in history as one of the great American progressive leaders was assured. It was 28 years ago that Senator Norris really stood in the shadow. Then he voted against the first war with Germany when this country had determined to defend its rights, and he was thrust by Woodrow Wilson into that "little group of willful men." But Hitler's rise to power brought Senator Norris to the most complete reversal of his career. This time, despite his hatred for war inspired by the misfortunes of his family in the struggle between the States, he urged war to the hilt against both Germany and Japan.

His career was colored by the bitter experiences of an impoverished youth. It was inevitable that he should fight for the poor and oppressed. Elected to Congress as a partisan Republican, he became by slow stages a party maverick, an insurgent, an independent, and finally an ardent supporter of President Roosevelt. It was he who led the revolt in the House against the iron rule of Speaker Cannon. The list of constructive legislation he fathered is extensive and impressive. He was the author of the twentieth amendment, which outlaws "lame duck" or hold-over sessions of Congress. He brought the single house legislature to Nebraska. He was responsible for the vast power enterprise of the T. V. A., and it was with infinite satisfaction that he saw similar authorities established in other sections of the country. No man could ask a more monolithic monument than Norris Dam.

But his character was his noblest monument. Grave and gentle in individual relations, he was hard as granite toward the things he hated. Above all, he hated corruption and sought to crush it. Wrong-headed he could be. Wrong-hearted he never was. His influence will remain as the shining exemplar of the utterly sincere and honest man in politics.

Civilian Public Service Camps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Friday, September 1), 1944

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting and illuminating letter addressed to me by the noted authoress, Miss Ruth Suckow.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA, August 31, 1944.

Senator GUY GILLETTE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR GILLETTE: I am writing you about a matter which has greatly concerned me all during this war period, the position of our conscientious objectors. If there had been more time, last evening at Mr. Paul Diamond's, I should like to have told you and Mrs. Gillette something about the trip I made during the earlier part of the summer, visiting six Civilian Public Service camps and one mental hospital unit, in North Dakota and the three West Coast States. I went under the auspices of the American Friends and Brethren service committees, and the F. O. R. for their educational program, and talked on subjects related to writing and literature in general.

While there are all kinds in these groups, as in every sort of group, I would like to say that I found here some of the finest young men I've ever met, taking their responsibilities seriously, thoughtful, deeply devoted to the best service of their country and the world. They have taken a different way of moving toward world peace, the one that seems to them most hopeful, but their objective is the same as that which you expressed in your talk at Cedar Falls. They take their stand on that same pronouncement of 2,000 years ago.

I can testify that the majority of men in these camps are working hard in the long-time service of their country. The financial situation of many of them is getting serious. Some have been in C. P. S. since the beginning of the draft. Two dollars and fifty cents a month doesn't go far. The hand-me-down left-over C. C. C. coats and shoes don't always fit. At all the evening meetings where I spoke, men sat patching up old clothes and even shoes while they listened. There is considerable soreness, too, in regard to the fact that in a democracy such as ours, a minority group is allowed to work for its own Government at less than subsistence wages. Many feel this makes a bad precedent. The question of dependents is very serious. Mrs. Roosevelt recently in some of her columns took a stand against an allowance for the dependents of conscientious objectors, describing them as men who in this crisis are doing what they like. They certainly are not. Most of them would like to give aid and relief immediately in war-torn areas everywhere. The work of the guinea pig units shows that they don't shun danger. They feel that their families are being penalized for their stand on the grounds of religious conscience—one of the things that has entered into the making of our country from the very start, from the landing of the Pilgrims. The men know that they are a minority, were prepared to sacrifice and have sacrificed many cherished things, present approval of communities and country, financial benefits of all kinds, jobs in many instances They know there won't be any priorities on jobs for them after the war.

I don't wish to present these men as martyrs—they aren't, and aren't willing to be considered so. But I do wish to express concern for their actual needs. The burden is too heavy on the small peace churches alone, although what these groups do accomplish seems close to miraculous often, considering their numbers. Help from other churches doesn't meet the situation. And I agree that a precedent of work without adequate pay may well be dangerous. As one individual, I want to urge that the Congress move in the matter of financial support for men in Civilian Public Service.

Knowing your sincere devotion to world peace, and your humane spirit, I hope you will take the case of these young men into your consideration. I realize that the Congress as a whole may not be willing now to take up this matter, and yet I believe it no more than right that it should be done. I am speaking from personal experience—I met several hundred conscientious objectors on my recent visits, had intimate and candid talks with individuals, and for some time have corresponded with boys in C. P. S. all over the country, have read a great many of the things they have written, in which they express their deepest convictions and experience. They have sent me these manuscripts for criticism on literary grounds.

I am very glad to have had the opportunity of meeting you and Mrs. Gillette. Please give Mrs. Gillette my best regards.

Sincerely,

RUTH SUCKOW,
(Mrs. FERNER NUHN.)

Commendable Candor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. COSTELLO
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, reading the Palo Alto Times recently I was very much struck by a brief editorial which appeared therein. It commented upon the commendable candor with which Jim Farley frankly admitted he and former Vice President Garner had discussed politics when they met. At a time like this, in the heat of political campaigns throughout the Nation it is interesting to know that outstanding leaders of the country such as Mr. Farley are so very frank and forthright in their statements. It is unfortunate that the same frankness and honesty is not displayed by the various groups which are today active in the political campaigns. I am sure that the people as a whole would thoroughly appreciate such frankness and that it would materially benefit the Nation to have the present campaigns conducted openly, honestly, and fairly.

The editorial to which I refer reads as follows:

COMMENDABLE CANDOR

James A. Farley, after a visit recently with former Vice President John Nance Garner, said, "We discussed politics from every angle. Mr. Garner, like myself, is concerned with conditions in the Nation now."

Of course they talked politics. Who among us isn't talking politics in the thick of a Presidential election campaign? Most especially we would expect exactly that at a meeting of two such notable, top-notch politicians as Farley and Garner. What we like about the Farley statement is its characteristic honesty and candor. It is in such striking contrast to the hypocritical pose taken by some men who, although being politicians, currently engaged in discussing, directing, and manipulating politics in closed rooms, pretend publicly to have neither time nor thought for such things when there is a war to be won.

Pope Urges Enforced World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT
OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news item from the Washington Post under date of September 2, 1944:

POPE URGES ENFORCED WORLD PEACE—APPROVES ROOSEVELT'S IDEAS TO MAINTAIN POST-WAR SECURITY BY POLICE FORCE

VATICAN CITY, September 1.—Pope Pius XII, addressing the world on the fifth anniversary of the war's outbreak, appealed tonight for the establishment of effective international machinery to render future conflicts impossible.

Voicing the hope that the present war might soon come to an end, His Holiness expressed approval of a post-war league to maintain security, corresponding to ideas set forth by President Roosevelt, and declared that such an institution must have teeth to enforce its decisions.

The Pontiff, in a broadcast over the Vatican radio, pointed out that an enduring peace could be built only on the foundations of moral justice and the well-being of the world's peoples.

END ARMED MIGHT

He called for an end to the rule of armed might in international affairs, declaring:

"Humanity is horrified in the face of the abysmal misery into which the spirit of violence, domination, and force has cast it."

A world battered and devastated by the ravages of history's greatest war, the Holy Father proclaimed, is determined to prevent the recurrence of such a catastrophe.

"We express our approval of the aspiration for a new universal peace institution," he said, "and put forward the wish that its creation truly metes its high aims, namely, the maintenance of tranquillity and world security."

FAVORS POLICING

The Pope further made it clear he favors international policing. He declared this was "inevitable within juridically and morally justifiable limits even after the conclusion of peace in order to safeguard the observance of treaties and prevent attempted new conflicts."

"An ancient world lies in wreckage," the Pontiff exclaimed. "The earliest possible rebirth of a new world, juridically healthier and more orderly—that is the yearning of martyred peoples."

His holiness stressed further that the well-being of nations and their people is one of the essential prerequisites of lasting peace, declaring:

"Mankind expects at the end of the war a definite improvement in its condition."

He said humanity in the last 5 years has traveled a trail of tears and blood.

He spoke of cooperative unions among nations which he said must pay their part in the post-war society.

Veterans' Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, in the many duties which are ours as Members of Congress, one of the first in my judgment is to keep the people at home informed of legislation of particular interest to them. I particularly refer to the benefits which have been provided for the service men and women, veterans, and their dependents.

The many requests for information regarding these benefits indicates the need for a digest of the law on the subject that may be used as a ready reference and sent by the families, if they so desire, to their relatives in service, thereby keeping service men and women fully informed of the protection provided under our laws, and the necessity for compliance with the details in connection with making application for benefits thereunder.

Our Government should be liberal with those who wear its uniform in time of war. Our servicemen are the best paid, best trained, and best equipped in the world. The fact that our veterans and their dependents are better provided for than those in any other country is further proof that America cannot and must not forget those who fight and die to sustain the kind of life we cherish in America. Whether our forces serve at home or upon foreign fields, we must at all costs maintain that form of government which they have loved so deeply and have fought so nobly to sustain. Our matchless men and women in uniform will win this war, but we in Congress must provide the basis for a permanent peace and a lasting prosperity at home.

I am happy to have had a small part in the enactment of this legislation and I shall bend every effort to make sure that while these boys and girls are away the pure fountains of our form of government shall not be polluted with the poison of some foreign isms or tainted with the dangerous doctrines of political plotters at home.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES FOR DEPENDENTS

Dependents of all grades of enlisted men and aviation cadets of the Army and Navy are eligible to receive a dependent's allowance from the Government in addition to the servicemen's allotment. Those men and women serving as officers come under another system. The allotments and allowances provided by the Government are as follows:

Class A dependents: A wife, $50; a wife and one child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife, $42; a divorced wife and one child, $72; and $20 for each additional child. Note: If the divorce or separation order of the court does not call for alimony or separate maintenance, the wife will not receive any allotment, and in case of a court order providing alimony or separate maintenance, she will get no more than the amount fixed by the court.

Class B dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is substantially, but not completely, dependent upon the serviceman for support. A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent and any number of brothers and sisters, $37; two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37.

Class B–1 dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is completely dependent upon the serviceman for support. One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; one parent and each additional brother or sister, $50 plus $11 for each brother or sister; two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $68 plus $11 for each brother or sister; a brother or sister but no parents, $42; each additional brother or sister without parents, $11.

It is important that men and women with dependents make application through their commanding officers for allotment and allowance, as these benefits will begin the date application is filed. Allotments are compulsory only for class A dependents. If the service man or woman for some reason or other fails to make application or is in a position where he or she cannot make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. The Army requires their regular application blank to be filled out, the Navy requires merely a letter giving the name of applicant's wife and children and dates of birth. In case a man is reported missing in action, the allotment and allowance, continue to be paid for a period of a year, unless, in the meantime, his status is definitely determined.

Parents and brothers and sisters who can prove dependency can receive an allowance at the same time as wife and children. Parents can get an allowance from more than one son or daughter in the service. For instance, if two parents are greatly dependent upon a son or daughter in the service, they get $68 per month. Now, if another son or daughter in the service helped support these same parents, they can get another $37 from the second son or daughter.

The agency for the Navy having jurisdiction over allotments and allowances is Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C. The agency for the Army is Office of Dependency Benefits, War Department, 213 Washington Street, Newark, N. J. If you experience any difficulty, contact your Congressman.

TEMPORARY AID FOR DEPENDENTS OF SERVICEMEN

Sometimes cases of extreme hardship arise involving dependents of servicemen. Many dependents, and even members of the armed forces themselves, are not fully acquainted with the two emergency agencies set up for the express purpose of helping such persons in need. These two agencies have branches all over the country. They are the Army Emergency Relief Fund, whose functions have recently been assigned to the Red Cross, and the Navy Relief Society, which also can be reached through the Red Cross.

ARMY RELIEF FUND

Any member of the armed forces in the Army can appeal to the Army Relief Fund, represented in all camps, or through the Red Cross if the soldier is not at camp, for needed immediate financial assistance. He will receive courteous and willing assistance at all times. The fund is also open to all dependents of men and women in the Army and anyone needing relief should get in touch at once with this fund through the local Red Cross.

NAVY RELIEF SOCIETY

Any serviceman or servicewoman in our naval forces or his dependents can appeal to this agency for urgent financial assistance. To get immediate action, it is advisable to take the case up through the Red Cross.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

This benefit is payable to all honorably discharged personnel of our services whose rank is below captain in the Army and lieutenant senior grade in the Navy. Payments are made in the following sums: Personnel with less than 60 days' active service, $100; personnel with 60 days' or more active service, none of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $200; personnel with 60 days or more active service, any part of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $300. Whenever mustering-out payments amounts to more than $100, payments are made in monthly intervals of $100 each. Servicemen who are discharged at their own request are not entitled to muster-out pay.

FREE MEDICAL AND NURSING CARE FOR WIVES AND INFANTS OF MEN IN OUR ARMED FORCES

Under this plan a wife of any man in service may receive prenatal care from a qualified doctor at her home or at the doctor's office. At childbirth, whether the wife of the man in service stays at home or goes to a hospital, she and her baby can receive free medical and nursing care. Complete maternity care is provided, including a physical examination 6 weeks after the baby is born. Besides all this, the baby is entitled to free medical care during the first year of life.

The wife should see a doctor at the first sign of pregnancy. She should then ask the doctor for an application form to apply for this free service. If the doctor does not have these blanks, write to the Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, California State Board of Health, Sacramento, Calif., and ask them to send a blank to you. Fill out the application blank carefully. Be sure to include your husband's serial number. The wife fills in part 1 of the blank. Ask your doctor to fill in part 2 at once and send it immediately to Sacramento for approval. It is important that wives apply for this in early pregnancy; the State board of health will not approve payments of the doctor, hospital, or any service before the application is made out. In the case of emergency be sure that the doctor makes application for you within 48 hours, or no bills for medical or hospital service will be paid. The charges are paid directly to the hospital and the doctor and the nurse; no money is given to the wife. This service is extended to wives and infants of servicemen in Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Alaska, but not to any other foreign country.

SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY PENSIONS

Our honorably discharged veterans of all wars are entitled to a pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by their service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10 percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as a hand, foot, or eye, blindness, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month.

The disability claim is filed by the veteran for benefits payable to him as the result of injury or disease resulting from military service. The award of compensation is based on the degree of disability which is determined according to the Veterans' Administration schedule provisions. Any disability, except misconduct, is compensable if it is as much as 10 percent disabling. This application is known as Form 526. It is simple to execute and seldom does one have any trouble answering the questions. Additional evidence is seldom required. This is particularly true on the adjudication of the initial claim. No subsequent formal claim need be filed. If the veteran is dissatisfied with his present rating he can submit medical evidence to this effect.

However, it should be borne in mind that the doctor's statement must state not only his diagnosis but sufficient findings to warrant it. It is essential that this evidence show, or at least indicate, a higher degree of disability than the present evaluation. Upon receipt of competent medical evidence the Veterans' Claim Service will authorize an official physical examination for rating purposes, thereby reopening the case for further consideration.

Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred from one Veterans' Administration facility to another, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged for disability whose claims, with essential service and medical records, are forwarded to area offices for settlement, veterans should file claim on proper form which will be supplied them by any Veterans' Administration facility, or the local representative of the American Red Cross. If the disabled person is insane or incompetent the manager of the Veterans' Administration facility will file all necessary claims for him.

READJUSTMENT TO CIVIL LIFE—EDUCATION

One of the provisions of the so-called G. I. bill of rights offers an education to any man who served for a period of 90 days, on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of the present war, and who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, and who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service. Application must be made therefor within 2 years after discharge. The Government will pay to the school of the veteran's choice up to $500 per year for tuition and books and will pay to the veteran $50 per month maintenance if without dependents, and $75 if he has dependents. Any man who served 90 days on or after September 16, 1940, may receive 1 year's schooling and 1 month additional education for each month in active service, but in no event shall the total period of education exceed 4 years. There is also a provision for part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance but with payment of tuition and other expenses.

A veteran also has the right to vocational education for service-incurred disabilities, extended to those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

Application for education and training should be made to the Director, Servicemen's Education and Training, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

HOSPITALIZATION AND PROSTHETIC APPLIANCES

Adequate hospital facilities are provided for the care and treatment of veterans for nonservice disabilities or diseases as well as for disabilities or diseases incurred in service.

The veteran has the right to adequate prosthetic appliances and necessary training to effect the greatest possible benefits in the use of such appliances.

RIGHT OF MEDICAL REVIEW OF IRREGULAR DISCHARGE OR RELEASE FROM ACTIVE SERVICE

A veteran has the right of review in cases of irregular discharge or release from active service, (a) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to determine whether the person at time of committing the offense was insane, in event of which determination, benefits to which the person would otherwise be entitled shall not be forfeited; (b) except in case of separation by sentence of general court martial, any enlisted man or officer may have a review by an authorized board to determine the correctness of such discharge or dismissal; (c) any officer retired or released to inactive status without pay may likewise have a review by an authorized board to determine retirement rights.

Under both (b) and (c) above, the claim for review must be filed within 15 years after discharge or dismissal or within 15 years after the effective date of the act, whichever be the later.

LOANS FOR THE PURCHASE OR CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES, FARMS, AND BUSINESS PROPERTY

Loans provided for the above-mentioned purposes or for the alteration or improvement of buildings or equipment may be guaranteed not to exceed 50 percent of the loan, the total amount guaranteed as to any one person not exceeding an aggregate of $2,000. Loans may be made by an individual or by private or public—State or Federal—lending agencies or institutions. The interest rate must not exceed 4 percent. The loan must be practicable and suitable to veterans' circumstances. The loan must be repaid in 20 years. Application must be made to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

EMPLOYMENT OF VETERANS

A veteran of any war, honorably discharged from any one of the services, has the right to register for employment and for placement in employment by the Veterans' Employment Service. He should contact his local United States Employment Office in his home town or county.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

There is also a provision for unemployment allowances of $20 per week while unemployed. To be eligible the person must reside in the United States; be completely unemployed, or if partially unemployed, at wages less than $23 per week; be registered with and report to a public employment office, be able to work and available for suitable work.

Any person will be disqualified if he leaves suitable work voluntarily without good cause or is suspended or discharged for misconduct; if he, without good cause, fails to apply for suitable work offered; if he fails, without good cause, to attend an available free training course; if he is participating in a strike or labor dispute causing a work stoppage.

BENEFITS FOR DEPENDENTS AS A RESULT OF LOSS OF SON, DAUGHTER, HUSBAND, OR FATHER

There are four money benefits provided for the dependents of a deceased veteran; 6 months gratuity payment, monthly insurance payments (if the serviceman applied for insurance), monthly pension, and back pay.

GRATUITY

The gratuity is a lump-sum payment equal to 6 months' pay at the rate received at the date of death. In addition, the dependents of any private or seaman who dies in foreign service receive 20 percent of his base pay, and the dependents of any officer who dies in foreign service receive 10 percent of his base pay. If the serviceman was in either the flying service or submarine service, his dependents receive, in addition, 50 percent of his base pay. There is also a longevity provision in addition to the above amounts.

The gratuity is automatically paid to a wife of a deceased veteran, or if there is no wife, it is automatically paid to the surviving child or children. It is not automatically paid to parents or brothers or sisters of an unmarried serviceman. The serviceman should designate some one of this latter class to receive it; however, if he does not, they may apply for it. If two parents survive, the amount is divided between them. A grandparent must show an insurable interest in order to receive it.

Application should be made by the surviving relative of a soldier to: Gratuity Pay Branch, Finance Office, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue, N. E., Washington 25, D. C.; by the surviving relative of a seaman to: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

MONTHLY INSURANCE PAYMENTS

This insurance is not paid in a lump sum; it is paid on a monthly basis, depending on the age of the beneficiary—the older the beneficiary, the higher is each monthly payment. On a $10,000 policy, if the beneficiary for whom payment is first made is under 30 years of age at the date of death of the insured, payment shall be made in 240 equal monthly installments, at the rate of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance. If the beneficiary to whom payment is first made is 30 or more years of age at the date of death of the insured, payment shall be made in equal monthly installments for 120 months certain, with such payment in installments continuing during the remaining lifetime of such beneficiary. For instance, under a $10,000 policy, a 50-year-old beneficiary will get $53.90 monthly. Under the same policy a 70-year-old beneficiary will be $85.10 monthly, and so forth.

It would be well to have parents and next of kin check with the men and women in service to see that all insurance certificates are in order and in the hands of the persons designated by the service men or women to receive them. An insurance policy taken out by men and women in service can name any of the following as beneficiaries: Wife, husband, child, stepchild, illegitimate child, parents, brother, or sister, including those of halfblood. There is nothing to prevent a parent or brother or sister from being the beneficiary of more than one serviceman.

All dependents and next of kin ought to check their insurance policy now. See that everything is in order now. It might save a lot of grief in the future. Negligence has caused many a beneficiary to lose out. A little care can avoid a lot of trouble should anything happen. I would suggest that you send your serviceman this pamphlet so that he may check all matters pertaining to his beneficiaries.

MONTHLY PENSIONS

This pension is paid automatically to a wife and children. All children under 18 are eligible. Children up to 21 are eligible if they are in school up to that time. If a child marries before 18 or 21, they are not eligible for this pension. Parents who have been dependent upon the deceased man or woman in service are also entitled to a pension. Parents who have been dependent upon a deceased serviceman can get a pension at the some time his wife and children are getting a pension. The amounts of the monthly pension are as follows:

One parent, $45 a month. Two parents, $25 each. Widow, but no child, $50; widow with one child, $65, with $13 for each additional child. No widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38 equally divided, with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100.

The fact that a widow, a child, or parent gets the insurance, does not prevent them from getting a pension also. They can collect both insurance and a pension.

BACK PAY DUE THE SERVICEMEN

When a casualty occurs, that service man or woman who has become a casualty may have back pay coming. All this back pay is paid to the nearest heir. Application should be made by the surviving relative of a soldier to: Finance Officer, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue NE., Washington 25, D. C.; by the surviving relative of a seaman to: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

HEADSTONE FOR GRAVE

Any person may make application for a headstone for the grave of any veteran of any one of the Army or Navy services whose service was honorable, to the Quartermaster General, War Department, Washington 25, D. C.

BURIAL ALLOWANCE FOR ANY WAR VETERAN

After honorable service, reimbursement for burial may be allowed, not exceeding $100, on burial, funeral, and transportation expenses. Application should be made to Director, Dependent Claims Service, Veterans' Administration, Washington 25, D. C.

Burial in a national cemetery may be arranged for any honorably discharged veteran or for anyone who dies while in active service, with right of burial therein of his wife or widow, and under certain circumstances his minor children or adult unmarried daughters.

WRITE FOR OTHER INFORMATION

It is exceedingly difficult to cover all the details of benefits available to veterans of this and previous wars. I have tried to sketch briefly the benefits particularly relating to World War No. 2, as many pamphlets have been printed covering the provisions for veterans of other wars. I merely offer this digest as a guide to servicemen, veterans, and their dependents. If anyone has special questions or individual problems not covered in this summary, I suggest you write to me personally, to the following address: NORRIS POULSON, Room 236, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

The Rotation Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday's mail brought me a poem written by a serviceman with more than 2½ years service in the Pacific area. This poem expresses my own thoughts on the so-called rotation plan better than I could hope to express them in my own words.

None of us have any desire to say or do anything that would retard the winning of the war in the Pacific at the earliest possible date, but I have been forced to the conclusion that to date the War Department has not done everything that could be done to speed up the rotation plan announced last April.

During the past 10 months I have corresponded with the War Department and with General MacArthur's headquarters, urging that whenever possible, men with more than 1½ years' service in the Southwest Pacific area be brought back to the United States, at least for an extended furlough. Some of the former Connecticut National Guard troops have now had more than 2½ years' jungle service. Among the Connecticut troops serving in the Pacific is an antiaircraft unit. I am at a loss to understand why some of the antiaircraft regiments who, until recently, were guarding industrial areas throughout the country, could not now be shipped to the Pacific, thus permitting troops with long service to return home. The longer these men are kept in the jungle without relief, the greater the expense we are piling up for the future, to say nothing of the loss of life and health.

The poem above referred to follows:

THE ROTATION PLAN

As days passed on and on, and months turned into years,
The soldier needed something to comfort his many fears.
His thoughts turned ever homeward, as only a soldier's can,
And from this urgent problem was born the rotation plan.

In words concise and pretty, it sounded fine and daper.
Indeed it was encouraging and looked so good on paper.
In flowery words and phrases, it built hopes in every man—
Surely it is wonderful—this new rotation plan.

Men who served the longest in places of desolation
Would be the first sent home when they started the rotation.
Eighteen months away from home made one ready to depart.
But holy smokes! We're away 2 years before the thing did start.

While waiting for the quotas, the time so swiftly flew,
Rumors came and went, as only Army rumors do.
Serving in the north so long, we were as happy as could be;
For according to this plan, we'd get priority.

Then one day arrived the news for which we had waited.
At last we'll hear the number of those to be rotated.
But wait, what's this—it can't be true!
Instead of ten or twelve, there are only one or two.

Such news as this is excellent, and so encouraging to be true;
For the boys who are lucky will be home by '52.
Then another thing we like so well is the adherence to this plan
For the time above a year and a half isn't really worth a damn.

One more thing that elevates our hearts in silent glee
Is the speedy way the boys are sent to their homes across the sea
After 3 months' operation, we are just 6 months behind,
And apparently the "powers that be" certainly do not mind.

Now what has happened to cause delay, questions every man,
What is wrong with this hope of ours—this great rotation plan?
Doesn't anyone consider the feelings of an old G. I.?
Isn't there anything left at all, upon which we can rely?

Oh my, yes, to be sure, excuses are handed all around,
Shipping space is scarce, and replacements can't be found,
Yet there are millions of men at home who have never been away,
And ships are leaving daily for the good old U. S. A.

With these facts in mind there are things we'd like to know,
For with each day that passes our doubts increase and grow.
Is this plan a child of the present political race?
A politician's dream with which he hopes to cinch his place?

Could it be just a trial to see what it would do
Toward giving us a lift and build up hopes anew?
Is it just a plan to give morale a raise?
Or perhaps a feeble try to bring forth home front praise?

One thing more we'd like to ask before we sadly close,
And we'd appreciate an answer from one who truly knows,
Just how long will we be stuck where going's tough and life is bare,
Three years away from all we love—really, don't you think we've done our share?

Why Give History Chance to Repeat?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from the Hartford (Conn.) Daily Courant of August 24, 1944:

WHY GIVE HISTORY CHANCE TO REPEAT?—ROME AND FRANCE, RELUCTANT TO "CHANGE HORSES," SAW REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT DEGENERATE INTO DESPOTISM

To the EDITOR OF THE COURANT:

I have just been rereading Mr. Roosevelt's preconvention letter to Mr. Hannegan—the one in which he described his yearning to return to civil life. "All that is within me," he said, "cries out to go back home on the Hudson River." Yet with Spartan fortitude he said he was ready to answer his country's call to a fourth term, because he thought only of the good of the American people.

I have reread, also, Gov. Robert S. Kerr's keynote address at the Chicago convention and several other speeches delivered at that momentous gathering. All these stirring utterances left me with two disturbing thoughts, namely, that the language of ambition and sycophancy has not changed throughout the ages; and that republics are singularly vulnerable to subversion by designing men who have discovered that the key to personal power is the credulity of the public.

The historian Tacitus' tale of the fall of the Roman Republic is a sorry one. He begins by pointing out that the partisans of Rome's "new deal" "had no leader but Octavius"—a shrewd and popular hero, who grasped at power "which he professed to assume for the protection of the people." These are the historian's words—not mine.

CAESAR AUGUSTUS, IMPERATOR

You may remember that young Octavius, on his entry into public life, promptly underwent a curious metamorphosis. He changed from being a defender of the republic into Caesar Augustus, the founder of Imperial Rome. Of course, this did not just happen of itself.

Tacitus says: "In a little time, when he had allured to his interest, the people by distribution of corn * * * his views grew more aspiring. By degrees, and almost imperceptibly, he drew into his own hands the authority of the Senate, the functions of the magistrates, and the administration of the laws."

No effective opposition seems to have been offered to these encroachments. Men's minds were blinded to future dangers by the sweets of the present which they owed to Octavius. To be sure, the forms of the Republic were still scrupulously respected. And as Tacitus says, "the magistrates retained their ancient names," but the republic was overthrown, nevertheless, and nothing remained of ancient manners or ancient spirit. Of independence, or the equal condition of Roman citizens, no trace was left. All ranks submitted to the will of the prince.

Do peoples profit by past experience? Unfortunately they do not. Look at what happened to another republic in later times. On the threshold of the nineteenth century the corrupt directorate of France was overthrown, and a new republican government was instituted under a written constitution, with Napoleon Bonaparte its chief executive.

The times were astonishingly like our own. The French Revolution, which began in 1789, unleashed forces that everywhere weakened or destroyed old loyalties. Indeed, none of its leaders limited the Revolution to the boundaries of France. "The globe was the country of its dogmata," said Lamartine, "France was only the workshop. It worked for all other peoples." Soon the continent of Europe trembled under the tread of marching feet. And even in the Middle East the sound of heavy guns echoed and reechoed among the Pyramids. A world war was in progress.

THE INDISPENSABLE NAPOLEON

The stream of events had become a raging torrent. Should a republic change horses in the midst of such a stream? The partisans of Bonaparte said emphatically—no. The state required stability and continuity of policy. So Napoleon's term of office was extended 10 years beyond its original limit. Do the grounds put forward to justify this change sound familiar? Listen. The senatus-consultum said:

"Considering that, in the existing circumstances of the republic, it is the first duty of the conservative senate to employ all the means in its power in order to give the government the stability which can alone augment the national resources, inspire confidence without, establish credit within, reassure our allies, discourage our secret enemies, remove the evils of war, bring to maturity the fruits of peace, and leave to the wisdom of administration the selection of the proper period for bringing forward all the designs which it may have in view for the happiness of a free people," etc., it was necessary to extend the executive's term of office.

How did the "Indispensable Man" take this proposal? "The interest of my glory and happiness," said Napoleon, "seem to have marked, as the termination of my public career, the moment when a general peace was signed. But you deem a new sacrifice necessary on my part. I will not scruple to undertake it, if the wishes of the people prescribe what your suffrages authorize."

This is not the end of the story. An inordinate political appetite seems to grow with what it feeds on. The torrential stream of events showed no sign of subsiding. So, still further precautions were taken against the possibility of changing horses. The term of office of the first consul was again extended, this time for life. Oh, yes; it was all very democratic. The question was put to popular vote. And out of 3,557,885 votes cast—3,368,259 were in the affirmative. But just the same the outlines of the Republic were becoming dim. Indeed, they were no longer visible.

Napoleon had begun like Octavius and followed in his footsteps. When the time was ripe to abandon all pretense and to bury the Republic under the trappings of empire, the sycophants who surrounded him exclaimed: "Greatest of men, complete your work; render it as immortal as your glory. You have extricated us from the chaos of the past; you have overwhelmed us with the blessings of the present; nothing remains but to guarantee for us the future."

With these words Bonaparte was implored to assume the imperial crown. In accepting this added burden, he said: "Fifteen years ago, by a spontaneous movement, we ran to arms, we gained liberty, equality and glory. Now these first of blessings, secured beyond the possibility of chance, are beyond the reach of danger; they are preserved for you and your children." There would be no more talk of changing horses in the midst of the stream. But a free republic had given place to an Asiatic despotism.

It may be true that history does not repeat itself, but sometimes it shows a frightening disposition to do so. Why give it a chance?

General Marshall and the German Rout

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, not long ago certain interests in Washington sought to send Gen. George C. Marshall to London and replace him as Chief of Staff. Following disclosure the plan was abandoned. In view of what happened I believe the following editorial which appeared in the September 2 issue of the Washington News should be preserved:

MARSHALL AND THE GERMAN ROUT

In the midst of rejoicing over victories in France and the distribution of compliments to Allied commanders, one name should rank above all others. Because of his modesty the public knows little about him. But American officers will tell you that he deserves most of the credit, if any one is to be singled out. We mean General Marshall.

Our Chief of Staff is the top Allied strategist. While Roosevelt and Churchill take the spotlight, he does the actual planning. On the Anglo-American Combined Chiefs of Staff he is the most respected and influential member. Sometimes he is overruled by the politicos, but in the end they usually have to come back to his plan because events prove him right.

As a strategist Marshall is not original. His basic conception is the same as that of the great commanders of history—first cautiously amass overwhelming power, and then use it with lightning speed. His genius consists in a rare combination of patience and of daring—patience during the long period of preparation, and daring when the cards are running his way. The Germans did not invent the blitz. Marshall is a master of the war of movement. That is why his forces are now out-blitzing the Germans. He planned it that way.

Unlike some brilliant strategists, Marshall is also a great leader and organizer. He personally conceived the over-all plan for training, supplying, and transporting our mass Army to battlefields largely of his choosing at the early date when the wherewithal in men and materials was pitifully small.

He personally picked the commanders—in most cases jumping them over the heads of less able officers. Eisenhower, his chief choice, is his devoted junior. The two are so close it is impossible to separate the combat contributions of this perfect team. Bradley, Patton, Hodges, Patch all were picked and trained by him.

He gave the Army Air Forces its freedom and its growth and insisted that General Arnold be a member of the Chiefs of Staff.

In the Battle of Belgium and the Battle of Germany, into which the Battle of France is now so rapidly merging, we may rejoice that Marshall is the dominant military mind. If it is humanly possible to maintain the unprecedented speed by which the Allies have riddled the German Armies, he will do it. He, more than anyone, knows how much more expensive it will be in time and in Allied sacrifice if the enemy is given even a brief breather in which to re-form and stabilize a defense line.

For the first time the Germans are running. Keep them running!

Some Facts on the Table Mountain Dam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, the flood-control bill, H. R. 4485, which some time ago passed this House, was recently voted upon favorably by the Senate Committee on Commerce and is now pending for consideration in the Senate. One of the controversial items in the bill is the Table Mountain Dam, which is located in my district in California. I wish to present some factual matters in regard to that project, discuss the objections to the dam, and the alternatives which have been proposed to it.

LOCATION, SIZE, AND LIMITATIONS ON DAM

The proposed Table Mountain Dam is on the Sacramento River approximately 5 miles south of the Tehama-Shasta County line. It is to be approximately 170 feet maximum height. The present bill specifically limits the dam to the low-level structure, not to be built above the 400-foot elevation above mean sea level and on a foundation sufficient for such dam and not on a foundation for future construction of a higher dam. This language was put in the bill at my suggestion at the request of the Shasta County Table Mountain committee to foreclose the possibility of present or future building of a high dam which would flood much greater areas in Shasta County.

AREA FLOODED AND PROTECTED BY PROPOSED DAM

The low-level dam will flood 18,500 acres—10,900 acres of this is in Tehama County, which is not protesting the dam; 7,600 acres are in Shasta County, where there is vigorous opposition; 2,200 acres of the land in Shasta County is irrigated. The rest is dry farm or dry pasture. The total acreage below the dam to be protected by it is 150,000 acres. In addition, the dam is the key project of the Army engineers in the entire flood-control plan comprising a total of seven dams protecting one and one-half million acres of the most fertile land in the Sacramento Valley. There will be no towns or communities flooded, and the waters from the dam do not come within 7 miles of the city of Redding, the county seat of Shasta County.

SUMMARY OF OBJECTIONS TO THE DAM

The objections to the dam have centered around four primary points:

First. That the building of the dam will excessively damage Shasta County.

Second. That the building of the dam should be deferred until the feasibility of building tributary dams as an alternative is fully investigated.

Third. That the building of the low level dam will preempt the site for a future high level dam to be built by the Bureau of Reclamation.

Fourth. That the building of the low-level dam will effectively eliminate the salmon industry.

I will discuss each one of these objections in order.

WILL THE DAM EXCESSIVELY DAMAGE SHASTA COUNTY

Less than 50 percent of the total flooding back of the dam is in Shasta County—7,600 acres—compared to 10,900 acres in Tehama County. Of this less than a third—2,200 acres is irrigated lands—the balance being dry farm, dry pasture, or river channels. Neither Cottonwood nor Anderson will be flooded, nor any other community, and the water will not back within 7 miles of the city of Redding. There has been much loose talk about the water backing into the city of Redding, and this proposed dam utterly ruining Shasta County.

The above figures give the facts. Tehama County is not even complaining about losing nearly 11,000 acres; why should the loss of 7,600 totally ruin Shasta County? It represents only a small part of the total area and the total wealth of the county. Admittedly, the dam will do some damage. But, it will protect 150,000 acres. If one group because it is to be damaged to some extent can stop a project which will be an overall benefit, then no flood-control project could proceed. The Shasta Dam would not have been built, nor any of the others which are giving vast benefits to the people in this country. The question as to whether or not damage is excessive depends upon the need and the benefit to accrue, and that question has to be answered in the national interest.

THE TRIBUTARY DAM PROPOSAL

It has been generally admitted that flood control on the Sacramento River is necessary. But it has been argued that flood control can be accomplished by a method less damaging to Shasta County by dams on the tributaries. If such is feasible it should be done. But the Army engineers investigated the proposed tributary dams, and state they are not feasible—that they would cost a minimum of $90,000,000. This is $64,000,000 more than the proposed Table Mountain Dam. The Shasta County engineer estimates that the tributary dams for flood control only can be built for $40,000,000. That is $14,000,000 more than the cost of the Table Mountain Dam. In other words, even on the lowest figure the taxpayers would be paying $14,000,000 to save the 2,200 acres of irrigated land in Shasta County. In addition the tributary reservoirs, built almost entirely in Shasta County, would flood more land in Shasta County than the Table Mountain Dam and some of it good land, even though in total it might not be as valuable.

The Bureau of Reclamation has made some investigation of the tributary proposal and has stated that it is physically feasible. It is physically feasible to build a dam across the Golden Gate. The question is whether or not the cost can be justified. And the Bureau, in all these months, has never come forward with a proposal to build the tributaries and has never made any statement of their cost or their economic feasibility. The Bureau has never mentioned the tributary-dam proposal in any of their studies filed on post-war planning, not even mentioned it as under study. The Bureau proposal to build a dam at Table Mountain has, however, been mentioned in such studies time and again. And one of the objections made by the Bureau to the dam proposed by the Army engineers is that it will take their site for a dam at Table Mountain.

In summary, the tributary proposal has been rejected by the Army engineers as too costly; the Bureau of Reclamation has taken no definite action on it; and it has no sponsors whatever, save those in Shasta County, opposing the Table Mountain dam.

WILL THE LOW DAM PREEMPT THE SITE FOR A HIGH DAM?

This brings me to the objection to the Table Mountain Dam, mentioned by Mr. Bashore, of the Bureau of Reclamation, in his testimony before the Senate committee hearing the flood-control bill, that the Army taking this site will preempt a site long in the plans of the Bureau for a high dam at Table Mountain. Surely those protesting the low-level dam can find little comfort in this argument, and I can agree with them because I have always opposed a high dam. However, the Army engineers have stated that they do not believe that the site at Table Mountain will sustain a high dam. Such being the case, the Bureau and those advocating a high-level dam for the generating of power are being deprived of nothing in the Army taking the site for a flood-control project.

WILL THE SALMON INDUSTRY BE ELIMINATED?

The fourth and last point raised against the dam is that it will destroy the salmon breeding grounds which are the basis of a million-dollar fish industry. No counties in my district are interested in this industry so far as I know, but the question raised does bear upon the overall merit of the project. Some sporting organizations, the California Fish and Game Commission and the Fish and Wildlife Service, have questioned the possibility of saving the salmon. They do not know that it cannot be done; they think it is in serious doubt. The Army engineers, in conjunction with the Fish and Wildlife Service, are now making studies to handle the problem. The Army engineers claim that it is being successfully handled at other larger dams where the same problem existed. The Director of Natural Resources of the State of California has said that the problem can and will be taken care of. The entire salmon industry does not depend upon the few spawning grounds above the proposed site of this dam and below the Shasta Dam. And the record is conspicuously lacking in any showing of great alarm on the part of the million-dollar industry which supposedly would be ruined.

THE IRON CANYON SITE AS AN ALTERNATIVE TO THE TABLE MOUNTAIN SITE

The Army engineers are currently studying the possibility of the substitution of a dam at the Iron Canyon site for the proposed Table Mountain site. The Iron Canyon site is several miles farther down the river. If the dam is built at Iron Canyon it will reduce the total acreage flooded in Shasta County from 7,600 acres to 3,650 acres—over 50 percent; it will reduce the irrigated acreage flooded in Shasta County from 2,220 acres to 830 acres—almost two-thirds; and it will reduce the dry farm land flooded in Shasta County from 1,280 to 300 acres—over 75 percent. In Tehama County the irrigated acreage flooded by the two dams would be the same—1,000 acres each; the dry farming land flooded would be reduced from 3,400 acres to 340 acres—a 90-percent reduction; the dry pasture and channels land flooded would be increased 6,500 to 11,010—almost 70 percent. However, the total values involved would probably be less. The total acreage flooded in Tehama County would be increased 10,900 to 12,350.

Whether or not the Iron Canyon site is finally selected will depend among other things upon the comparative merit of the foundation with that of Table Mountain, and the local sentiment as to which site would more nearly conform to local wishes. The report of the Army engineers on the Iron Canyon site was submitted to the Shasta County Table Mountain Committee for their consideration and comment but to date they have given no expression on it one way or the other. Objection has been received from some of the farmers in the Cottonwood-Anderson irrigation district, who claim that the Iron Canyon project is not as desirable because it will not flood as much of the district as the Table Mountain project. They contend that the Table Mountain project is an answer to their water-shortage problem as it will eliminate excess lands, leaving those remaining with adequate water.

ALL CALIFORNIA FLOOD CONTROL GROUPS FAVOR TABLE MOUNTAIN DAM

The Table Mountain Dam was under consideration over 30 years ago. It was considered as a site for the present Shasta Dam. The merits and demerits of the project have been debated all those years. Since the Army announced their program for the Sacramento River the matter has been fully discussed before the California State Board of Reclamation, charged with the responsibility of flood control in California, the Committee on Water Problems of the California State Legislature, and the Flood Committee of the California State Chamber of Commerce and the Directors of the California State Chamber of Commerce. Each and all of these agencies after full hearing on the Table Mountain project have gone on record approving the program of the Army engineers. The Director of Natural Resources of the State has publicly supported the project. None has found in favor of the tributary proposal or even recommended that the authorization of the project be deferred for further investigation of that proposal. They have been equally unimpressed by the other arguments against the dam.

IN CONCLUSION

First. The dam would flood 7,600 acres of land in Shasta County of which 2,200 acres is irrigated land; the dam would protect 150,000 acres. Many of the landowners in the area to be flooded have expressed themselves as not opposed to the building of the dam.

Second. It is generally admitted that flood control is necessary and no better feasible method has been proposed. The tributary dam proposal is totally lacking in engineering support.

Third. In hearing after hearing before Federal and State agencies the arguments against the dam have been fully presented and the decisions have been unanimously for the project.

Fourth. The authorization of the project will permit it to be built at either the Table Mountain or Iron Cayon site; if both sites are feasible the dam should and will be built at the one most agreeable to the local people.

Tributes to Hon. James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Friday, September 1), 1944

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials relating to the public services of the Honorable James A. Farley.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Hawkeye-Gazette, Burlington, Iowa, of June 13, 1944]

STILL A STRONG MAN

Big, good-natured Jim Farley has resigned as chairman of New York's State Democratic committee, but don't get the idea for a minute that Jim Farley is out of politics or that his day of influence has come to the setting of its sun.

Farley is a realist. He is a rugged individualist. He has political character, plus a political sagacity that is almost supernatural. Through personal friendship, politics, business, and religion Farley has a tremendous following, and it will remain loyally admiring until his dying day.

He has an uncanny memory. Once when we ran into him in a hotel lobby in New York and when introduced as hailing from Burlington, he beamed, and boomed, "How's my friend, Ray Baxter?" It is said Farley knows more people intimately and can call more names than any other citizen.

Farley, more than any other man, is responsible for the political success of Franklin D. Roosevelt. He started F. D. R. on the road to the Presidency. He stuck with him through thick and thin, until his stomach rebelled against much of the New Deal trickery and sham.

When he stepped out of the President's Cabinet gracefully and without any publicly expressed hard feelings, he also retired as national Democratic chairman. Then enemies within the Roosevelt ranks attempted to purge him as chairman of the New York State committee. It was a tender spot—a blow below the belt. Farley wouldn't stand for it, and he triumphed in the show-down.

Farley was opposed to a third term for the President, but remained loyal to him. He still is loyal to Roosevelt through friendship's sake, but he cannot subscribe to a fourth term. Unquestionably he is getting out of the New York chairmanship now ahead of the national convention in order to make it easy for the Roosevelt crowd and to leave him a free agent.

We don't believe Farley will ever desert the Democratic Party as such. He loves it passionately * * * the old rugged Democratic Party before it began to turn pink. He owes it much, and it owes him more. But Jim Farley won't give Franklin D. Roosevelt more than lip service as a personal friend, in a fourth-term campaign, and it wouldn't surprise us if he becomes quite outspoken on the subject.

Farley is a man of convictions, and has the courage to express them and to stand by them * * * win, lose, or draw.

[From the Pawtucket (R. I.) Times of June 12, 1944]

MR. FARLEY STEPS DOWN

In appraising the work of James A. Farley, politician, it is not necessary that one should speak either as a critic or as an admirer. Rather, the correct approach would be, we think, that of the onlooker at life, the recorder of an event or a series of events. Great affairs have been brought forward in American political life in the past two decades, and James A. Farley has been a part of them. He is a man, then, not yet to be appraised but to be reported.

Yet, now that he has given up his office of chairman of the New York State Democratic Committee, one finds it difficult to look at his work objectively. We have said here that it is not necessary to speak either as a critic or an admirer in discussing him. But actually it is hard to escape both attitudes. And when you come down to cases you must admit that, regarding Mr. Farley, you are more likely to admire than to criticize.

If you are a Democrat, you find more Republicans admiring him than any other Democrat; the same is true if you are a Republican. You can remember party associates saying frequently and fervently, "What we need is a Farley." Verily this man has built up a host of friends among those who do not believe in his political philosophy.

Whether he is retiring from politics we do not know. He is a man who speaks and writes freely, yet he knows how to keep his own counsel. But it must be difficult for him to keep out of politics. We think we can see lonesome days ahead for him. He has attached himself to a great private business, and perhaps it may be thought that anyone in business in these days has enough to do. We hope he finds it as stimulating, as much a part of himself, as the political life has been.

And we are informed by the New York Times that he has been a political chairman 26 years, a long time. He presided over the Democratic organization in his county of Rockland before he became a national leader as chairman of New York State committee and the national committee. And of him the Times also says:

"He has done an immense amount of drudgery. He has managed effectively a great Government department. Now, in a letter full of characteristic kindness for his fellow-workers, he becomes free at last to earn the competence which his great ability, exclusively exerted, would have won him long ago.

"A political chairman usually becomes something of a mythological figure. To his opponents his words and his works are evil. Mr. Farley did not entirely escape the demonologists, but the sinister myth could not stick long to a personage so incorrigibly honest, friendly, and straightforward. Even the straightest-laced objectors to his code of sticking to his party through thick and thin had to make him an exception. Both politicians and the public have been impressed by his character."

It is worth while to work hard, and to take the bumps that a man in politics gets, to win such tributes from a great newspaper. We expect, of course, to hear more from Mr. Farley whether he steps entirely out of political life or not. It has been a pleasure to record his comings and goings through the years.

Army Delivers C. I. O. Literature

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks, I am attaching part of a column written by Bill Cunningham and published in the Boston Herald recently. Mr. Cunningham is a responsible newspaperman. In the first paragraph of his column he states that he has the name of the officer who provided the information to which he refers and that he is at liberty to use the man's name if, by so doing, it would serve some useful purpose.

I call this incident to the attention of the House Military Affairs Committee and urge that that committee investigate the facts disclosed. If the story is true, I agree with Bill Cunningham when he says that courts martial should be in order for all concerned. If the story is not true, that fact should be made available to the public, in all fairness to the C. I. O.

The article follows:

"But," then he writes, "here's one for Ripley. The other day a United States Army amphibious duck came alongside us and shoved aboard our ship a bundle of C. I. O. news publications called the Pilot. Laugh that one off. That's election year for you in the U. S. A. What's the idea? Is it 'Win the votes and to hell with the war?' Or has John L. Lewis et al. taken over entirely. We've had no mail for nearly 5 months over here. There's been but one mail delivery since we arrived, yet the C. I. O. seems to have no difficulty getting its literature over and in having it delivered to our boys and our ships, where men are not communistic, are not striking, are not indulging in slowing down the war effort, nor endorsing anybody for office, but are daily risking their necks and fighting like hell for all peoples, all parties, the U. S. A. and the world.

"This C. I. O. contribution is delivered by United States Army soldiers, in U. S. A. ducks, while ships lay out here actually waiting for ducks with which to get vitally needed supplies to the men fighting ashore. We need 'em to discharge the cargo so we can go back for more. But the United States Army can wait. Evidently the C. I. O. has a priority. It can get ducks to swing around distributing its house organ, when we can't get 'em to move food and munitions ashore.

"I could say plenty more, and will about that sort of thing when I get home, but I know it would be useless now because it would undoubtedly be censored to hell, but when I get home I intend to see whether free speech, like the ducks, is reserved for the C. I. O. and the politicians who know how to win votes regardless of how deceptive their words or their actions may be. I'm not alone in feeling as I do. There are plenty more of us over here who feel the same way and we intend to see that some of these affairs are brought out into the light for the American people to examine.

"We can't even get mail from home, yet time, money, and space is wasted by the delivery of C. I. O. literature to the invasion front in France by United States soldiers whose hours, energy, and equipment is supposed to be employed in winning the war. It simply doesn't add up and we're all plenty burned up about the situation."

There's more, but that's the report. As above, I haven't been honored with a perusal of The Pilot, and the gentleman offers no survey of its contents, although he refers to it in one place as "damned Communistic propaganda."

But the C. I. O. is definitely in the political business. It has called its shot in the open and it has publicly campaigned through the primaries. It publicly campaigned at Chicago. Its national action committee is endeavoring to lay a $1 levy upon every C. I. O. member for a fourth term campaign fund. It has publicly endorsed the fourth term and is universally considered a new holding company for the New Deal-leftist division.

Any C. I. O. publication is naturally suspect, but even if it were as sweet and free from guile as a Sunday school weekly, what the hell is it doing taking priority over invasion beach cargoes, and being distributed by United States Army soldiers? Congress should see if the charges in this letter are true, and if they are, courts martial should be in order for all concerned, including the C. I. O.

Post-War Highway Legislation Needed Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, there are two highway bills—S. 2105 and H. R. 4915—before the Congress for its consideration. These bills call for a post-war highway construction program which, in view of impending events, we should consider immediately.

The development of our roads by the States in conjunction with the Federal Government was stopped after our entry into the war except for those projects necessary to the war effort. This has meant that our highways have had to carry wartime loads under conditions that made proper maintenance impossible. Because of the rapid deterioration of our roads due to these conditions, there is a real need for replacements and reconstruction.

The furthering of this program will also create employment in the post-war period for men returning from the service as well as for civilians now engaged in war industry and will eliminate the need for setting up public works projects of an artificial nature. It is also necessary to consider now because the highway departments of the States cannot properly proceed with post-war highway plans until such time that post-war Federal-aid highway legislation has been enacted by the Congress.

Federal highway aid has in the past been allocated on the basis of one-third area, one-third population, and one-third post-road mileage. This policy should, I believe, be continued. States like Montana, with a large area and great mileages of road, have generally spent their automotive taxes so as to get the most roads from their limited tax revenues. In considering post-war highway construction and development we should keep in mind the fact that more than 30 percent of the people of the Nation live in rural communities of less than 2,500 population, and that there are 54,000 communities in the United States that are dependent solely upon automotive transportation for the movement of goods and persons.

The need for haste is emphasized by the fact that any program which may be passed by the Congress must be approved by the various State legislatures. Forty-five of these legislatures meet next January and many of them will not meet in regular session for another 2 years. Time, as can be seen, is running against the States because blueprinting of post-war road construction projects cannot go forward and improvement programs cannot be formulated until we determine what our Federal-aid policy shall be. It will also take about a year to perform the necessary engineering and legal work after Congress has acted.

Mr. Speaker, during the reconversion period that lies ahead, there will be millions of men who cannot be absorbed by private industry. Therefore, to fill a pressing need and to cushion the shock of transition from a war to a peacetime economy, it is imperative that this program be undertaken at once so that men can be put to work on sound projects thereby furnishing necessary employment and, at the same time, giving to our highway systems the necessary repairs, replacements, and new roads needed. We should consider this legislation and pass on it before we recess. We cannot afford delay.

Issues in the November Election

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Friday, September 1), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio broadcast delivered by Gov. Andrew Schoeppel of Kansas on Friday night, September 1, over a coast-to-coast hook-up, sponsored by the Republican National Committee.

While I have the floor, I wish to call attention to one or two of the statements made by Governor Schoeppel, which I believe to be worthy of special consideration.

This political campaign, Governor Schoeppel predicted, will be a fighting campaign because the issues are fighting issues.

The thing that is at stake next November—

Said Governor Schoeppel—

is your freedom and my freedom; it is whether your children and mine will be their own masters in a Nation where heretofore the people have been the masters, or whether a vast all-powerful, super-government will order their lives, possess their minds, and dominate their spirits.

After referring to the rising power of pressure groups backing bureaucracy, Governor Schoeppel charged:

The New Deal administration has been attempting to curry favor with these groups. The most despicable, graft-ridden gang of political thugs is welcomed with wide-open arms if they can deliver a block of votes. We now have a national administration which has aligned itself with every corrupt political machine in the country.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We are beginning a national political campaign. In such a campaign we believe plain facts should be stated and understood. In my small part this evening, I want to talk just as frankly and just as plainly as I know how.

This campaign will be a fighting campaign because the issues are fighting issues. They are not partisan issues between Republicans and Democrats. They are deep-down American issues.

FREEDOM AT STAKE

The thing that is at stake next November is your freedom and my freedom; it is whether your children and mine will be their own masters in a Nation where heretofore the people have been the masters, or whether a vast all-powerful, supergovernment will order their lives, possess their minds and dominate their spirits. That is a stake well worth fighting for.

We who are interested in the Republican cause propose to fight for it and to fight as hard as we know how. The American people in order to intelligently decide issues in our democracy must have the facts. We want to give those facts, and give them straight from the shoulder.

For the past 12 years we have witnessed in this country the building up of a tremendous Federal bureaucracy. This has gone on to such an extent that we are now largely governed by boards and bureaus and directors and coordinators. To the extent that this is actually necessary for the successful prosecution of the war, we all gladly submit to it. But to the extent that it is unnecessary for that one great purpose, we object to it with all of the strength and vigor at our command.

NOT PARTISAN ISSUE

I said this wasn't a partisan issue. All true Democrats know what the stake in this election is. We are indebted to them for warning us long ago. Senator BYRD, of Virginia, warned us. So did Senator O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, and Senator GEORGE, of Georgia, and Congressman HATTON SUMNERS, of Texas. They have made it clear that the issue in this year's campaign is the preservation of America's free institutions and the freedom of American men and women.

This issue arises because for the past 12 years there has been allowed to grow up in this country small groups of ambitious men who have organized themselves into pressure groups, as we have come to call them. The New Deal administration has been attempting to curry favor with these groups. The most despicable, graft-ridden gang of political thugs is welcomed with wide-open arms if they can deliver a block of votes. We now have a national administration which has aligned itself with every corrupt political machine in the country.

At this particular time we have a new pressure group which looms large on the New Deal political horizon and seems to be all-powerful in its councils. This group to which I now refer is called the Political Action Committee.

It has as its head Sidney Hillman. It takes its doctrines direct from Earl Browder. This Earl Browder-Sidney Hillman Political Action Committee is not democratic. It is made in the image of nothing that is American.

Why is this Browder-Hillman Political Action Committee promoting the fourth term? The answer is plain and obvious. They want a fourth-term administration because they want a government in Washington that they can use.

They want a government in Washington that is indebted to them up to the ears. And they expect to collect on that debt.

UNDER FALSE BANNER

To me the most alarming thing about all of this is the fact that this Browder-Hillman-Communist axis is attempting to parade under the banner of labor. It is not labor. Let me prove it to you.

Here is the voice of the 1,200,000 members of the railroad brotherhoods, which says in their own official newspaper, and I quote: "What concerns us is Mr. Hillman's proposal to raise slush funds to carry the coming election. Coupled with Mr. Hillman's own alliance with the Communists in New York State and elsewhere, we have a situation which is full of ominous possibilities for the entire labor movement."

Remember, this is not a Republican speaking; it is not a Democrat. That is the voice of labor.

Let me further quote from Philip Pearl in the Weekly News Service of the American Federation of Labor:

HARMFUL TO LABOR

"People have the right to know," he emphasizes, "people have the right to know the strongest antilabor movement in America today. It is the Political Action Committee. * * * We are convinced that Mr. Hillman's political gamble will not only prove a fearful boomerang for the C. I. O., but that it will do lasting harm to the cause of the entire labor movement in America."

Those interested in the Republican campaign propose to fight government by pressure groups. Government of the people must be by the people and their elected and duly authorized representatives. And most important of all, it must be a government for the people rather than a government for the benefit of any group or any class or any clique.

Sanctuary for Jews

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Friday, September 1), 1944

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "We Must Give Jews Sanctuary," written by Harry H. Schlacht and published in the Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph of September 3, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE MUST GIVE JEWS SANCTUARY

(By Harry H. Schlacht)

America must act now.

The beasts of Nazi Germany are pledged to slaughter every remaining Jew in Hitler-held Europe.

Millions of Jews already have fallen, consumed by fire and sword.

They are dying daily of starvation and of barbarous executions.

Tens of thousands of innocent people—children, infants and sucklings, old men and women, cry out to America:

"Save us!"

The Hearst newspapers appeal to the conscience of the civilized nations to give the Jews of oppressed Europe sanctuary.

They seek to arouse a storm of public indignation against the horrors of this persecuted race.

They call upon the United Nations to rescue them from their torture.

Like the shot fired at Lexington, our militant appeal will re-echo 'round the world.

Our voice will be heard.

Our words will be forged into thunderbolts to be hurled into the teeth of tyrants.

Upon what this Nation does will determine the destiny of these long-suffering people.

The mighty power of America, which a beneficent God has given us, we hold in stewardship for all mankind.

She is the land of the crusader, who wills to do right because, before God, it is right.

Let us show the world that the heart of America is kindly and human as its sword is invincible and mighty.

There have been programs in history.

But never before has the cold, organized destruction of defenseless human beings been established as a fixed official policy to be carried out ruthlessly by agents under government orders.

It is the blackest crime in the annals of recorded time. Christendom has spoken in England.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has called upon civilized mankind to act at once.

Hear his stirring words:

"We urge the government of the United Kingdom to give a lead to the world by declaring its readiness, in consultation with the governments of united and neutral nations, in finding immediate refuge in territories within the British Empire and elsewhere for all persons threatened with massacre who can escape from Axis lands or for those who have already escaped to neighboring neutral countries."

The American tradition of justice and humanity dictates that every possible means be used to save the last remnants of the Jewish race.

Let us open the doors of Palestine to these refugees, a land given to them, under oath and covenant, by the Lord as an eternal heritage.

Let us persuade the neutral countries to permit them to seek temporary security within their borders.

They have stood as a symbol of right through the centuries.

It was born of sorrow.

It was kindled in the fires of inquisition.

It comes from the poetry of their prayer books.

If we allow these people of the Bible to perish, it will be an eternal blot of shame on the shield of mankind.

Theirs is a challenge to the moral sense of civilization.

Let us beseech almighty God for His helping hand,
To rescue those in ravaged lands.
Let us raise our anguished cry,
As tortured thousands daily die,
And the souls of helpless people suffocate
Within the walls of hate.

A Way To Solve Problems in the Missouri Valley—Valley Authority Can Do It, But Is Not Necessary—Suggestions on Protection of Western Water Rights, Coordination of Plans, and Joint Authorization of Both Army Engineers and Reclamation Programs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, in many quarters there is a growing tendency for people to throw up their hands when a problem confronts them and say, "Oh, let us have a committee investigate that," or "Oh, let us create a new commission to do that," or "Oh, let us have a study made." This tendency, Mr. Speaker, expresses itself now with regard to the flood and related water problems of the Missouri Valley by the proposal to create an authority into whose lap the entire matter can be tossed.

I do think that a Missouri Valley Authority, properly constituted, could set up and operate an interrelated program of flood control, irrigation, power development, navigation, soil conservation, wild-life control, and so forth. I do not, however, think that such an authority is necessary. I do not, in fact, think that additional studies, surveys, and bureaus or commissions are necessary.

TWO PLANS HELP EACH OTHER

The Army engineers, for their part, have proposed a logical and well-considered plan of flood control that embraces some multiple-purpose reservoirs that will serve all other interests. The Bureau of Reclamation, for their part, have proposed a well-considered plan of irrigation and power utilization that admirably complements and supplements the works proposed by the engineers.

The Soil Conservation Service, the Fish and Wildlife Service, and the State services in the several States can continue to operate in the valley under their plans as they now do. There is no need for a valley authority to go into their fields.

There are pending in the United States Senate two bills, H. R. 3691, the rivers and harbors bill, and H. R. 4485, the flood-control bill, which offer a complete opportunity for integration of these plans and initiation of them as among the first of the post-war construction work programs.

These bills have already passed the House, and when action on them is completed, draftsmen can start immediately upon designs and specifications for the initial structures. Money available to the Army engineers for plans and designs, provided in the civil functions bill approved last June, was specifically made available for work on projects thereafter as well as previously authorized.

In other words, if action had been completed on these bills in July, engineers would be drawing the plans for the first works today.

On the other hand, the proposals for a valley authority suggest a 2-year period for additional surveys and studies and reports and coordination; two years. In the last 2 years, floods in the Missouri Valley have caused direct dollar damage in the amount of $114,000,000. Why take a chance on doing that again? Why not, instead, get started on the remedial measures and apply the cost of the damages to prevention? Why wait 2 years more to get under way?

It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that delay plays into the hands of people who are opposed to doing anything. That is what I feared last winter and why I urged the Bureau of the Budget to recommend authorization for the features that the two plans, Army engineers and reclamation, had in common, leaving controversial features to be settled when we reached them.

AN INTERSTATE, A NATIONAL PROBLEM

People who are acquainted with the Missouri Valley flood problems, Mr. Speaker, cannot be content to do nothing. They know that the floods cost far more than it will to prevent them. They know, also, that control of the longest river system in the country is essentially an interstate, a national problem. The interstate character of the Missouri River floods was graphically portrayed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] on the floor of this House, last spring, when he said:

> The Missouri River is establishing a new channel at its mouth. The confluence of these two great rivers is being moved 26 miles upstream. A new river is being opened through what was a short time ago inland fields. Through this new avenue water is rushing at the rate of 17 miles per hour. It has engulfed whole sections of the M. K. & T. Railroad and the Burlington Railroad. It has obliterated interstate highways. It has broken the pipe line which runs from Texas to New York, which has been carrying the oil without which the New England States would have endured the greatest privation. It is sweeping away the cables carrying electric current from the Keokuk Dam to metropolitan St. Louis, and steel towers supporting the transmission lines are at the bottom of the river. It has resisted all efforts to curb the current and hold the levees and railroad embankments and railway cars loaded with rock for revetment have been undermined and rolled into the river. It has destroyed light, telephone communications, and sanitary systems. So rapid has been the rise of the waters that it has been necessary to organize relief to rescue marooned families from farm homes. The loss to agricultural production is incalculable. Growing fields, livestock, machinery, fences, houses, barns, and equipment have been swept away overnight and cannot be replaced in time to produce a crop without Federal assistance in the form of both loans, grants, and priorities.

DROUGHTS AS WELL AS FLOODS

The interstate character of the droughts that have afflicted upper portions of the Missouri Valley is well stated in the report of the Bureau of Reclamation, published as Senate Document 191 of this Seventy-eighth Congress, second session. On pages 98 and 99 the story of Ward County, N. Dak., is given. In the single year from July 1, 1938, to June 30, 1939, expenditures for relief and charity amounted to $154,715.43. That in a single county, Mr. Speaker, and 87.5 percent of the amount came from the State and Federal Governments.

In that crop year of 1938, Ward County wheat averaged 5.9 bushels per acre and potatoes 52 bushels. But in 1941, with abundant rain, Ward County lands averaged 20.7 bushels of wheat and 92 bushels of potatoes. If the flood waters on the Missouri that cause the havoc in the lower valley were held back and put on the lands of the upper valley in the dry years, the damage would be prevented downstream and the relief loads would not occur upstream.

So, this is an interstate problem; it is a Federal problem. And that is why a valley authority will be accepted by the people of the valley if there is no other way to get results—but why wait?

Why create another board or bureau or authority? Why commission some new agency to start all over with surveys and studies? Why give to some agency that is not responsible to the people, independent of Congress, the authority to take over and run affairs in the valley when a solution has already been presented by the two experienced agencies already in the field—the Bureau of Reclamation and the Corps of Army Engineers?

AGENCIES ARE TOGETHER

Presumably the answer is that these two agencies have not presented a joint report. Mr. Speaker, these two agencies or their representatives, in meeting after meeting, in hearing after hearing, have expressed their common points of view. All that is needed is to take their repeated statements and embody them in the legislation now pending.

Under the restrictions of existing statutes, the Army engineers may not make reviews of or supplements to reports that have been submitted to the Congress unless they are requested to make a review report or there is further legislation thereon. But the engineers, in response to questions at hearings and in response to letters by Members of Congress have clearly indicated the points of coordination.

And similarly, so have representatives of the Bureau of Reclamation.

Recently the Missouri River States Committee, composed of the Governors and two representatives of the nine States in the Missouri Valley, met at Omaha and adopted resolutions asking the Congress and the President to call for a written coordination of the reports by the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation and then to pass a joint authorization for the coordinated program.

As one who attended that meeting as one of the representatives of the State of South Dakota, I have endeavored, Mr. Speaker, to work out a way for those resolutions to be carried out. From my knowledge of the general subject and from what I have heard at various meetings and hearings and from participation in the debates of the House on this subject, it seems to me that this coordination and joint authorization calls for three things:

First. A satisfactory reservation or guarantee of water for irrigation and other beneficial consumptive uses in the semiarid portions of the West.

Second. Technical coordination of the physical features of the two plans, Army engineers and reclamation.

Third. Amendment of the pending bills to authorize both programs as thus coordinated in order to produce the comprehensive plan for complete development.

Consequently, believing that these bills should be passed now in order to permit plans to be drawn so that this work in the Missouri Valley can be ready for the soldiers when they return from Europe and the benefits for flood control, irrigation, and other purposes be realized at the earliest date possible, I have ventured to prepare suggestions to carry out the Omaha resolutions under these three heads.

AMENDMENTS NEEDED

I. PROTECTION TO IRRIGATION

The following language is suggested as embodying the full protection sought by paragraph (c) of the so-called O'Mahoney-Millikin amendment, while at the same time avoiding the interpretive fears expressed by the Army engineers for controversies on consequential damages with injunction suits and other litigation.

The language gives an absolute, unqualified protection to irrigation, and yet is in line with the thought expressed by General Reber at the Omaha meeting. Here is the suggestion:

Projects herein or hereafter authorized with benefits to navigation shall not be construed as limiting or preventing the right of anyone to use waters west of the ninety-seventh meridian for beneficial consumptive purposes including irrigation and mining and the satisfying of domestic, municipal, and livestock needs.

The proper place for such a statement of policy, it seems to me, would be to incorporate it in the sections of both H. R. 3691—rivers and harbors—and H. R. 4485—flood control—that set forth the authorization for irrigation projects in connection with dams or reservoirs built by the Army engineers. Personally, I think it might be well to replace the last two sentences in those sections as reported to the Senate. To accomplish this in the flood-control bill, the amendment would be on page 6, line 21, to strike out the balance of the paragraph after the period, and insert the suggested language.

II. COORDINATION OF REPORTS

Study of the separate reports, Bureau of Reclamation and Army engineers, and hearing of a great deal of testimony at committee meetings and other gatherings suggests that the actual coordination of the two reports needs only to cover five matters. The balance of the coordination is already done by the common recommendations of the two reports.

It is suggested, therefore, that the Senate Commerce or Irrigation Committees could call upon the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army engineers for a joint statement upon these five points, same to be received by the Senate and printed as a Senate document for legislative reference and identification. In the absence of such an identification, the coordination can be placed in the bill by adding provisos to the authorization paragraph in the flood-control bill.

The coordination of the two programs, Army engineers and Bureau of Reclamation, will be accomplished by any such legislative device that incorporates in the authorization, an agreement that—

First. The Gavins Point and Randalls Island Reservoirs are to be constructed on the main stem of the Missouri River as proposed by the Chief of Engineers rather than the Randalls Island and Big Bend combination as proposed by the Commissioner of Reclamation.

Second. The Oahe Reservoir is to be built to a pool elevation of 1,620 feet as proposed by the Commissioner of Reclamation if the Chief of Engineers finds that to be structurally sound and feasible and is to be designed for multiple-purpose uses, including power and irrigation as well as flood control and navigation.

Third. The Garrison Dam and Reservoir shall be designed and built for the same multiple-purpose uses as Oahe, but shall not be designed or built to a height that will, in operation, back waters above the 1,837-foot elevation level, the purpose being to avoid injury to existing or potential irrigation projects above or in the vicinity of Williston, N. Dak.

Fourth. Upon completion of the first major reservoir between Fort Peck and Sioux City, the waters of Fort Peck Reservoir shall be made available for irrigation.

Fifth. The Bureau of Reclamation will select the sites, design, construct, and operate all dams built on tributaries of the Missouri River primarily for irrigation purposes, and will consult with the Chief of Engineers on flood-control features thereof; the Army engineers will design, construct, and operate any dams built primarily for flood-control but will consult with the Bureau of Reclamation for coordination of their location and design with existing or potential irrigation projects.

All other variations in the two programs are fully covered by the recommendations under which the two reports have been submitted to the Congress and would be law under the language of the authorization paragraphs.

III. ENACTMENT OF JOINT AUTHORIZATIONS

The following amendments if added to the bills pending in the Senate, will, it is believed, give effect to the coordination and accomplish the request of the Missouri River States Committee for an authorization of all three programs—flood control, irrigation, navigation:

FLOOD CONTROL AND IRRIGATION

Amend H. R. 4485, on page 20, line 12, by inserting after the words "substantially in accordance with the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers in House Document No. 475, Seventy-eighth Congress, second session" the following:

And the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Reclamation in Senate Document No. 191, Seventy-eighth Congress, second session, as coordinated by their joint statements in Senate Document No. ——, Seventy-eighth Congress, second session,

And in lieu of the words "and as thus expanded is approved" say "and as thus expanded and coordinated is approved."

And on the same page, in line 15, after "$200,000,000", insert "of which one-half is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of War and one-half is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Interior."

Which goes on to read "for the practical accomplishment", and so forth.

RIVERS AND HARBORS—NAVIGATION

Amend H. R. 3961 by substituting for the present paragraph on the Missouri River the following:

Missouri River: Waters in the existing Fort Peck reservoir heretofore constructed for navigation, power, and incidental purposes under the act of May 18, 1938, shall be available for the needs of irrigation upon the completion of a major reservoir between Fort Peck and Sioux City with storage equal to that of Fort Peck needed for irrigation. The Garrison reservoir, recommended by the Chief of Engineers in House Document No. 475, Seventy-eighth Congress, second session, is hereby authorized to be constructed and the necessary appropriations are authorized to be made. The existing project between Sioux City, Iowa, and the mouth of the river is hereby modified to include such additional bank revetments, construction works, cut-offs, removal of snags, and dredging as the Chief of Engineers may deem necessary to provide such navigable depths in excess of 6 feet as may be practicable with the flows which may from time to time be available.

Placing of the authorization for the Garrison reservoir in the rivers and harbors bill, it may be noted, Mr. Speaker, is proper since it will serve as a replacement for Fort Peck which is being released from navigation to irrigation. This is the proper place since all items, release of Fort Peck, creation of substitution storage, and the authorization for clearing the channel below Sioux City are essentially navigation items. This transfer of the budgetary charge for the Garrison Dam from flood control to river-and-harbor funds is equitable for the reasons just stated, and avoids impairing the flood-control authorization provided by the House bill now to be shared with the Bureau of Reclamation under the amendments proposed.

These suggestions are offered, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that they may be helpful in working out what has been one of the major legislative burdens of this Congress. They are not proposed as the only way to accomplish the end desired; they are proposed to show that there is a way to accomplish it, now.

The Pope on Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under the permission to extend my remarks, I include therein a splendid editorial, well considered and well written, entitled "The Pope on Peace," appearing in the Washington Star of September 3, 1944:

THE POPE ON PEACE

With more than a little solemn fervor, Pope Pius has now raised his voice in support of all those who are laboring today—at the Dumbarton Oaks Conference and elsewhere—for a just and lasting peace. In an address marking the end of the fifth year of the war, he has spoken movingly of the "terrible disaster, both spiritual and material," which humanity has suffered and of the impelling need to guard against a repetition of it.

"An old world lies in ruins," says the Pope, a world "shattered in its foundations and torn apart," and if the craving of peoples everywhere is to be satisfied, a new world must be built, "a healthier world, better directed, and legally more in harmony with the needs of human nature"—a world, above all, in which the nations will work well enough together to bind up the wounds of mankind "quickly and lastingly" and to prevent a recurrence of anything like the past 5 years.

To this end, Pope Pius unequivocally declares himself in favor of international organizations, "avoiding the omissions and deficiencies of the past," to preserve the peace "in accordance with the principles of justice and equity," not hesitating to use the sword—if necessary and if juridically and morally proper to do so—"to safeguard the observance of rightful obligations and prevent a temptation to conflict." In other words, the world needs a collective security system with teeth in it, one equipped to stop any future Hitler in the first act of aggression.

The Pope, however, considers such an organization as only part of what is required if our international society is to have health in the future. Long before the war began he repeatedly warned that the world was basically sick, primarily because it had begun to travel far from the religious or Christian spirit. This century has been an intensely pragmatic and ultramaterialistic one, with much of society inclined to scoff at the metaphysical and to measure life in terms of hard cash or what pleases senses of the flesh—as if human beings, like cattle, were totally earthbound; as if it were all a myth about man being made in the image and likeness of God, and as if the sole function of life were to gratify one's self as much as possible until the grave opened and everything then ended in eternal negation.

From such a materialistic attitude it is but a few steps, in strict logic, to the kind of world inherent in the philosophy of the Nazis. It is not for nothing, then, that the Pope pleads for the Christian spirit as something indispensable to the success of the next peace. This applies not merely to whatever international collective security organization is set up but also to the political, social, and economic order within individual countries. Our society must get back to recognizing more fully "the moral laws written by the Lord in the hearts of men, natural law deriving from God, the fundamental rights and inviolable dignity of the individual."

Such terms may sound abstract and metaphysical, but what kind of civilization can we have if we ignore them? The truth is that everything decent in man's history up to now has been actuated by them. Christian principles are not things to be confined to Sunday church going. They constitute a practical, working philosophy for our everyday life. Without them it will avail us little to make elaborate plans for a better world tomorrow.

Aid and Justice for Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARLE D. WILLEY

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include therein a resolution adopted at a meeting sponsored by the Council of the Polish Societies and Clubs in the State of Delaware, and held September 3, 1944, in Wilmington, Del.:

We, Americans of Polish descent, assembled at the Modjeska Hall, at Wilmington, Del., on Sunday afternoon, September 3, 1944, to commemorate the fifth anniversary of the treacherous attack on the Polish Nation by Germany, which started the total war.

Further, we, as Americans of Polish descent, upholding the American principles which stand for freedom, liberty, and independence for all nations throughout the world, also firmly stand by the Atlantic Charter, the four freedoms, and by the declarations of our President made so many times to the world, that this war is being fought for one purpose—the establishment of freedom and independence in all parts of the world.

Whereas 5 years ago on September 1, cloudless skies rained steel, devastation, and death upon Poland, for the Nazis unleached their hordes for conquest. Though unprepared for the attack, Poland resisted valiantly. Though disarmed within a month, terrorized, and subjected to unbelievable and fiendish tortures, Poland fought on—the only occupied country without a Quisling. For 5 long years within the borders of their motherland the Poles have been waging a desperate and relentless struggle, engaging in pitched battles, sabotage, and destruction of enemy war material, railroads, and military concentrations. Their secret courts have passed sentence and the underground fighters have sent hundreds of Nazi leaders to death. They have paid a terrible price for this activity during the 5 years of bondage. Hundreds of thousands of hostages were hanged or shot, and hundreds of villages and hamlets have met the fate of Lidice by being burned and plowed under in reprisal. The Polish underground army of 200,000, fully organized and diciplined fighters, has kept over 500,000 Nazi soldiers immobilized and about 60,000 Gestapo agents busy.

Whereas outside of Poland, in France and Italy, the Poles fight on as an organized and potential military force. In the invasion to liberate France, two armored divisions are now fighting alongside the Canadians and the British. In the campaign in Italy, 70,000 Poles, attached to the British Eighth Army, under the command of their own General Anders, are making great progress along the Adriatic shore, after covering themselves with glory at Cassino. The Polish Navy is also making history by taking part in invasions and sea patrolling, and in effective work against submarines and even battleships of the enemy. The Polish air force, composed of 14,000 men in 14 squadrons, is fourth in size among the United Nations, and Polish fliers have shot down 1,500 German planes. It has proved itself most able in the "Battle of Britain" and is continuing its great exploits over Germany and in the sky lanes over the battle fronts in France and Italy.

Whereas during the month of July, Soviet Russia daily made radio broadcasts appealing to the Polish underground to rise against the Germans, and when, on August 1, the Russian guns started bombardment of Warsaw 6 miles away, the Polish underground taking that as a signal, under the leadership of their General Bor, started a revolt against the German forces in Warsaw. To this day there are furiously fighting, holding their positions, appealing to the world for aid, as Russia on August 3, has stopped the bombardment and has not even sent one bomber to bombard the German positions in Warsaw. Shall Warsaw be denied adequate aid, it is difficult to understand why. We, therefore, implore our Government to grant as much lend-lease aid to General Bor and his underground army as is deemed necessary to carry on as effectively as possible their full collaboration with the United Nations to the end in order that complete victory might not only be assured but measurably hastened since Poland more than any nation deserves aid, for she has and is sustaining the greatest sacrifices for the common victory of the United Nations.

Whereas we are greatly disturbed in seeing the progress of international affairs pointing strongly to the ruination of the Atlantic Charter, the "four freedoms," and declarations made by the President to our Nation and to the world why this war is being waged. Having Soviet Russia openly disregarding by their action in annexing the Baltic states and nearly half of Poland into the Soviet Union, creating a committee to govern the remaining part of Poland, disregarding the only legal and rightful Government of Poland in London which is recognized by the United States and Great Britain, also creating their committee to rule over other nations in Europe.

We, patriotic Americans of Polish descent, believe that the time has come for the United States to act in order to prevent the death of Poland. If nothing is done, certainly the peoples of the world will have no confidence in our professions of freedom or our capacity for world leadership.

Furthermore we here assembled declare that further silence as to aggressive plans of Soviet Russia which are being already put into effect in Poland and in other nations in Europe will prove to the world that the Atlantic Charter, the "four freedoms," lend-lease agreement signed by Soviet Russia on June 11, 1942, and all other declarations that were made time and again to the world were nothing more than hyprocrisy proving that this war is not being truly waged in the interest of freedom, democracy, and justice.

The Approach to World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, approaching the close of this war, we of this Congress, Representatives of the people of this Nation, realize that one of the most compelling and important problems facing this Nation and the world is to try to work out some sort of a formula or plan that will bring about a just and enduring peace.

The Congress, some months ago, expressed its desire and, I believe, the hope of the American people when it passed the Fulbright resolution, expressing the purpose of the Nation in its willingness to cooperate with other nations in the hope of bringing about permanent and lasting world peace. The State Department, since that time, has met with other nations to study the vast problems for world cooperation in an effort to work out some just and equitable plans looking to that end.

In approaching this question it is my opinion that if we are to make the proper headway those representing our Nation must give first consideration to a realistic approach and, secondly, to the idealistic or spiritual side of the question. It has been my contention all the while that our influence at the peace table will be greater if our country could be kept in the strongest possible condition financially and if the other nations of the world realized that our spokesmen represented the unity and force of the American people when they speak at the peace table. Obviously, the greater our industrial and financial strength the greater will be our influence. That is one of the many reasons why some of us have urged the absolute necessity of making certain that we shall be able to enter the conferences at the peace table as a solvent Nation rather than we may find ourselves in such a condition at the close of the war that our freedom and representative form of government may be threatened with financial difficulties here at home. In addition, we must make certain that sovereignty of this Nation remains unimpaired.

Further approaching the problem in a realistic way it must be this Nation's policy since we have builded up the greatest naval and air forces in the world not to scrap this military equipment as we did after World War No. 1 but to maintain our naval and air superiority. Other nations cannot object and will not object to this position because the past history of a century has proven to the leaders of the nations of the world that America has never been and never will be an aggressor Nation. This Nation has contributed more of its money and resources to the defeat of the Axis Powers, and in this world war, than all of the other nations of the world combined, including the war debt of the Axis Powers.

If any of the nations of the world, after they have bound themselves by solemn agreements, are tempted to break those engagements, the naval and air power might of the American Nation will cause them to hesitate and most likely will be of sufficient influence to prevent such action and contribute to continuing peace. If we had had a naval and air force, one-half as large as we have at the present time, doubtless Hitler would not have started this war by attacking Poland. England, France, and America had lapsed into a lethargy of a lack of military preparedness that gave Hitler a right to believe that he could conquer England and France and that America, so wholly unprepared, would not attempt to enter the conflict. Such a situation should never be allowed to occur again.

I point out what I believe to be these two cold realistic approaches because I think it is necessary to follow such a policy at least for a number of years after the war until the nations and the peoples represented by their leaders at the peace table have a chance to try to cooperate, work together, and settle their internal differences and become accustomed to living in peace together without resorting to war. It is quite possible that in a number of years when the ideas of peace are deeply rooted in the minds and hearts of the peoples of the world that then a gradual reduction of armaments, world-wide, could safely be embarked upon, but, in my judgment, not until then.

Mr. Speaker, now I should like to call your attention to what I referred to as an idealistic or spiritual approach. Most all of the people of the world would prefer peace to war and destruction. I think it is safe to assume that the rank and file of the peoples of the world who have furnished the manpower and been the victims of the slaughter of war have never before been so impressed with the necessity of keeping the peace. Those who favor wars probably do not equal 3 percent of the people. It seems a tragedy that so few can bring such suffering, death, poverty, and hardship to so many of the people of the world. It is my opinion and the opinion of many of the leaders of world thought that at the basis of wars lie to some extent the fact that the people in their race in life for the material things have lost sight of their responsibility to the cultivation of the spiritual necessities and richness of life. For instance, if the Golden Rule were applied there would never be wars between nations.

It is the opinion of many men advanced in world thought that permanent peace ultimately, unless we are able to keep it by the realistic approach of power, must come from a resurgence of the spiritual welfare of men coupled with a great diffusion of education among the nations of the world. With more millions of people praying for peace than ever before in their humble homes throughout America and the extension of such spiritual supplications in their own form and manner from the uneducated masses of the world, is it too much to hope that out of the tragic suffering of the people of the world that they will in some way succeed in building such a foundation of spiritual and educational values that it may permanently support in the hearts, minds, and actions of the people a temple of justice and permanent peace?

As an example, this terrible war which has almost laid waste the world was started by two godless men, Hitler and Mussolini. They attempted to dethrone the power and influence of the Divinity of the centuries, dash to earth traditions of morality and the actuality of spiritual achievements and build upon what they thought would be the ruins, a world of power, greed, and savagery.

They have failed as every nation has failed since the dawn of civilization that has lost sight of the spiritual values of mankind.

Mr. Speaker, it is to be hoped that the selfishness of the national leaders of other nations which wrecked the peace negotiations at the close of World War I will not be in evidence at the peace table at the close of this War. It is to be hoped that the philosophy of the Golden Rule among nations will weigh more heavily in their deliberations than at the last great peace conference. It is the hope of the people of America and of the world that the men and women upon whom this tremendous responsibility shall rest may be able to work out a fair and just plan for continued peace.

The Case Against Oleo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. ANTON J. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, many years of my life have been spent in the dairy-products business. This experience has been both in producing milk and as a dairy-products manufacturer. In fact, I was president of the Illinois Milk Dealers Association for 5 years.

During all these years I have tried to keep abreast of the new discoveries in dairying and also familiarize myself with the legislative attempts to allow interstate shipments of filled milk.

Filled milk is milk with butterfat removed and cottonseed oil added in its place. This then is sold to take the place of condensed or evaporated milk. The substitution of cottonseed oil for butterfat in cheese has not as yet been advertised. The butter people have had a constant fight to protect their product from the unfair, false, and misleading propaganda and advertisements of the Oleo Trust.

During these years I have read and kept many articles and editorials from the papers, and also the experiments on oleo by the agricultural colleges.

My greatest surprise was last spring when I found the following editorial in the Milwaukee (Wis.) Journal of March 7, 1944. It is as follows:

OLEOMARGARINE IS HERE TO STAY

Senator SMITH, of South Carolina, wants the special Federal tax on colored oleomargarine repealed. He considers it a "damnable protective tariff" in favor of butter—a tariff which is made worse by the fact that many States also tax oleo in an attempt to keep it off their markets.

Protagonists of butter, as the only really adequate "spread for bread," will see red at this. They have usually maintained that what they are fighting for is not the sale of the white and "unappetizing" oleo but the sale of a product which, through the use of the same dye as makes butter its uniform yellow, "masquerades" as butter. They adopted that position somewhat late in their fight and only after it was established scientifically that fortified oleo has approximately the same dietary value as prime creamery butter. Today, however, it is their stock argument. They are willing, they say, to reduce or perhaps even remove the tax on white oleo, provided it is sold on its own (to them questionable) merits.

The fact is that the battle against oleo, colored or white, is already lost, though dairymen will not yet admit it. The wise farmer will begin now to condition himself to oleo's inevitable rise. In the long run, we doubt that dairy interests will suffer, since the demand for fluid milk and natural cheese is rising. The reason for that is that it has slowly dawned on the consumer that the butterfat is not the only important part of milk. The consumer now realizes that, while there may be a substitute for butter, there is no equivalent for the other valuable elements in milk.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot figure this out. Here was a paper in the leading dairyland State with such a misleading editorial. In the first place all oleo is not fortified. When fortified it has 9,000 international units of vitamin A per pound, and winter butter averages over 11,000 I. U.'s per pound, and summer butter over 20,000 I. U.'s per pound. Much butter also has 27,000 I. U.'s of vitamin A, or three times as much as oleo. Butter also has from 50 to 500 I. U.'s of vitamin D and oleo has none.

I wonder if the writer of this editorial would concede that—

First. If cottonseed oil or other vegetable oil is as good as butterfat, insofar as butter is concerned, would he recommend filled milk?

Second. Would his paper recommend that the butterfat in cheese be replaced in full or in part by cottonseed oil or other vegetable oil, so that filled cheese would be offered in place of good full-cream Wisconsin or Illinois cheese?

Third. Would he favor legislation that would allow filled milk to be marketed in place of natural condensed or evaporated milk?

Fourth. What would the Milwaukee Journal do with the butterfat if they were to make use of the skim milk where they say that "it has slowly dawned on the consumer that the butterfat is not the only important part of milk"? Cottage cheese has been made for centuries; where does the "slowly dawned" come in?

It seems peculiar to see any agency such as a newspaper in Wisconsin take this position. If the dairy farmers knew the strength of the vegetable oil interest in Washington, they would know the danger the dairy industry of the country is in at the present moment. I hope the dairymen of our country will wake up before it is too late and combat this type of propaganda.

Economic Situation in Italy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested this morning in reading an article from Rome which appeared in today's New York Times with regard to the deplorable food, public health, and mortality situation in Italy.

I noted with a great deal of personal pleasure the comment that my former chief, who appointed me assistant district attorney of Kings County, N. Y., Brig. Gen. William O'Dwyer, Chief of the Allied Control Commission's Economic Section, has in a short time become thoroughly familiar with the economic situation there and that Italian and some Allied officials agreed that of all the administrators sent to Italy during the occupation period none has worked so energetically and with such clear-cut vision as General O'Dwyer.

I am vitally interested in this very important matter not only because of my previous close personal association with General O'Dwyer but because of the many communications I have had from constituents of my district who have relatives living in Italy with regard to the unfortunate conditions in that country. I feel confident that this great nation of ours with its vast and rich economic resources will not permit the Italian people to perish for lack of food and proper public-health conditions but will promptly and adequately send relief to these stricken people.

The New York Times article follows:

ROME, September 4.—The situation in Italy with regard to food, public health, and mortality has become so alarming that Brig. Gen. William V. O'Dwyer, Chief of the Allied Control Commission's Economic Section, left Rome today on a dash back to Washington to place facts and figures before President Roosevelt.

Both he and other high officials here feel that not only humanitarian considerations of first rate importance are involved but that the whole test of whether we can give an example in Italy of the American way of life is in jeopardy.

The figures are so terrifying that they can be allowed to speak for themselves. It should be kept in mind that the Allied armies began the conquest of Italy on September 3, 1943, and entered Rome on June 4, 1944.

The infant mortality rate for Italy for children in their first year per 1,000 for live births in the years 1931 to 1935 averaged 104.7. From 1936 to 1940 it was 102.8. The figures for Rome alone (it is naturally impossible to get all-Italy figures now) for June 1943, was 287 per 1,000 and for June 1944, 393; for July 1943, 289, and for July 1944, 433.

In other words, during this July babies born alive in Rome since the preceding year were dying at the rate of nearly one out of every two.

POLETTI ALLOCATES MILK

So alarming was this situation that the office of Col. Charles Poletti, Allied Military Government Chief for the Rome area, has arranged to allocate milk destined for children between the ages 1 to 5 years to babies under 1 year, which has brought the latter's death rate down but obviously brings up the question of what is now going to happen to children between 1 and 5.

The general mortality trend is also upward, figuring from last year to this. For instance in June 1943, in Rome 1,373 persons died against 2,535 in June 1944. Similar figures for July are 2,032 and 2,321.

The tuberculosis death rate in Rome from January to July 1944, was 3,450 as compared with the prewar rate of 1,200. It is estimated that people are now dying of tuberculosis in Italy at the rate of 200,000 annually as compared with the prewar rate of 60,000.

An A. M. G. Rome health officer said about 2 months ago that the incidence of tuberculosis in Rome was about 200 per 1,000.

Here is the food situation. Before the war the average Italian individual consumed about 2,900 calories daily without alcohol and 3,100 with. During the first 18 months of war the Italian basic ration in Rome was 1,391 calories daily. During the next 12 months it was 1,129. For 9 months before the entry of Allied troops it reached an all-time low of 304.50.

VITAL NEEDS ESTIMATED

Since the Allied occupation a basic ration of 664.77 calories daily has been allowed.

It is estimated that the vital needs of the population are a basic ration of 1,400 calories with available ration foods to bring the daily total up to 2,700.

As things are now it is officially estimated that the average Italian has lost five to ten pounds in weight. In short, it is officially admitted that the Italian diet has caused a general loss of weight in population, an increase in general and infant mortality, an increase in the tubercular rate and a general increase in mortality to all diseases.

If the present basic ration is not increased there is no doubt in the minds of Allied medical and health authorities that existing mortality rates will show a continued increase.

These are some of the facts that General O'Dwyer is going to place before President Roosevelt. Prime Minister Churchill already knows what the situation is because he studied it on the spot while here and he is known to have been upset by what he found.

As Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt may meet soon it is hoped here that they will take what measures are necessary to save Italy from a situation of great gravity.

With harvests now coming in the country can get along until about the first of the year but between then and next July, as General O'Dwyer put it, it is a case of either helping them or letting them die.

Italians and some Allied officials agree that of all the Americans sent here during the occupation period none has worked so energetically and with such clear-cut vision as General O'Dwyer.

Excerpts From Inaugural Address of President William Henry Harrison

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include parts of the inaugural address of President William Henry Harrison, copied from volume IV, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, page 1860. This address was delivered March 4, 1841.

I wish every American might have the opportunity of reading this message. How applicable the words of President Harrison, stated over 100 years ago, are today. He emphasizes—

It is the part of wisdom for a republic to limit the service of that officer at least to whom she has entrusted the management of her foreign relations, the execution of her laws, and the command of her armies and navies to a period so short as to prevent his forgetting that he is the accountable agent, not the principal; the servant, not the master. Until an amendment of the Constitution can be effected, public opinion may secure the desired object. I give my aid to it by renewing the pledge heretofore given that under no circumstances will I consent to serve a second term.

And again let me quote:

Always the friend of my countrymen, never their flatterer, it becomes my duty to say to them that there exists in the land a spirit hostile to their best interests—hostile to liberty itself. It is a spirit contracted in its views, selfish in its object. It looks to the aggrandizement of a few, even to the destruction of the interests of the whole. The entire remedy is with the people.

Mr. Speaker, the Presidency of the United States is not a lifetime job for anyone. In the best interests of the country, two terms should be the limit. Let us not have a fourth-termer in the White House after January 1945.

The excerpts follow:

Called from a retirement which I had supposed was to continue for the residue of my life to fill the Chief Executive office of this great and free Nation, I appear before you, fellow citizens, to take the oaths which the Constitution prescribes.

It was the remark of a Roman consul in an early period of that celebrated republic that a most striking contrast was observable in the conduct of candidates for offices of power and trust before and after obtaining them, they seldom carrying out in the latter case the pledges and promises made in the former. However much the world may have improved in many respects in the lapse of upward of 2,000 years since the remark was made by the virtuous and indignant Roman, I fear that a strict examination of the annals of some of the modern elective governments would develop similar instances of violated confidence.

The outline of principles to govern and measures to be adopted by an administration not yet begun will soon be exchanged for immutable history, and I shall stand either exonerated by my countrymen or classed with the mass of those who promised that they might deceive and flatter with the intention to betray.

If we would compare the sovereignty acknowledged to exist in the mass of our people with the power claimed by other sovereignties, even by those which have been considered most purely democratic, we shall find a most essential difference. All others lay claim to power limited only by their own will. We admit of no government by divine right.

The great danger to our institutions does not appear to me to be in a unsurpation by the Government of power not granted by the people, but by the accumulation in one of the departments of that which was assigned to others. Limited as are the powers which have been granted, still enough have been granted to constitute a despotism if concentrated in one of the departments. Knowing the tendency of power to increase itself, particularly when exercised by a single individual, predictions were made that at no very remote period the Government would terminate in virtual monarchy. I should take this occasion to repeat the assurances I have heretofore given of my determination to arrest the progress of that tendency.

I proceed to state in as summary a manner as I can my opinion of the sources of the evils which have been so extensively complained of and the corrective which may be applied. Some of the former are unquestionably to be found in the defects of the Constitution—of these former is the eligibility of the same individual to a second term of the Presidency. The sagacious mind of Mr. Jefferson early saw and lamented this error, and attempts have been made hitherto without success, to apply the amendatory power of the States to its correction. As, however, one mode of correction is in the power of every President and consequently in mine, it would be useless, and perhaps invidious, to enumerate the evils of which, in the opinion of many of our fellow citizens, this error of the sages who framed the Constitution may have been the source and the bitter fruits which we are still to gather from it if it continues to disfigure our system.

It may be observed, however, as a general remark, that republics can commit no greater error than to adopt or continue any feature in their systems of government which may be calculated to create or increase the love of power in the bosoms of those to whom necessity obliges them to commit the management of their affairs; and surely nothing is more likely to produce such a state of mind than the long continuance of an office of high trust. Nothing can be more corrupting; nothing more destructive to all those noble feelings which belong to the character of a devoted Republican patriot. When this corrupting passion once takes possession of the human mind, like the love of gold it becomes insatiable. It is the never-dying worm in his bosom; grows with his growth and strengthens with the declining years of its victim. If this is true, it is the part of wisdom for a republic to limit the service of that officer at least to whom she has entrusted the management of her foreign relations, the execution of her laws, and the command of her armies and navies to a period so short as to prevent his forgetting that he is the accountable agent, not the principal; the servant, not the master. Until an amendment of the Constitution can be effected, public opinion may secure the desired object. I give my aid to it by renewing the pledge heretofore given, that under no circumstances will I consent to serve a second term.

There is still an undercurrent at work by which, if not seasonably checked, the worst apprehensions of our anti-Federal patriots will be realized, and not only will the State authorities be overshadowed by the great increase of power in the executive department of the general Government but the character of that Government, if not its designation, be essentially and radically changed. This state of things has been in part effected by causes inherent in the Constitution and in part by the never-failing tendency of political power to increase itself. By making the President the sole distributor of all the patronage of the Government the framers of the Constitution do not appear to have anticipated at how short a period it would become a formidable instrument to control the free operations of the State governments. Early in Mr. Jefferson's administration it became so powerful as to create great alarm in the mind of that patriot from the potent influence it might exert in controlling the freedom of the elective franchise. * * *

It is not by the extent of its patronage alone that the executive department has become dangerous, but by the use which it appears may be made of the appointing power to bring under its control the whole revenues of the country. The Constitution has declared it to be the duty of the President to see that the laws are executed, and it makes him the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. If the opinion of the most approved writers upon that species of mixed government which in modern Europe is termed "monarchy" in contradistinction to "despotism" is correct, there was wanting no other addition to the powers of our Chief Magistrate to stamp a monarchical character on our Government but the control of the public finances; and to me it appears strange, indeed, that anyone should doubt that the entire control which the President possesses over the officers who have the custody of the public money, by the power of removal with or without cause, does, for all mischievous purposes, at least, virtually subject the treasure also to his disposal. The first Roman emperor, in his attempt to seize the sacred treasure, silenced the opposition of the officer to whose charge it had been committed by a significant allusion to his sword. By a selection of political instruments for the care of the public money a reference to their commissions by a President would be quite as effectual an argument as that of Caesar to the Roman knight.

The influence of the executive in controlling the freedom of the elective franchise through the medium of the public officers can be effectually checked by renewing the prohibition published by Mr. Jefferson forbidding their interference in elections further than giving their own votes, and their own independence secured by an assurance of perfect immunity in exercising this sacred privilege of freemen under the dictates of their own unbiased judgments. Never with my consent shall an officer of the people, compensated for his services out of their pockets, become the pliant instrument of Executive will.

There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the Executive which might be used with greater effect for unhallowed purposes than the control of the public press. The maxim which our ancestors derived from the mother country that "the freedom of the press is the great bulwark of civil and religious liberty" is one of the most precious legacies which they have left us. We have learned, too, from our own, as well as the experience of other countries, that golden shackles, by whomsoever or by whatever pretense imposed, are as fatal to it as the iron bonds of despotism. A decent and manly examination of the acts of the Government should not only be tolerated, but encouraged.

The reign of an intolerant spirit of party amongst a free people seldom fails to result in a dangerous accession to the executive power introduced and established amidst unusual professions of devotion to democracy.

Long the defender of my country's rights in the field, I trust that my fellow citizens will not see in my earnest desire to preserve peace with foreign powers any indication that their rights will ever be sacrificed or the honor of the Nation tarnished by any admission on the part of their chief magistrate unworthy of their former glory.

Always the friend of my countrymen, never their flatterer, it becomes my duty to say to them that there exists in the land a spirit hostile to their best interests—hostile to liberty itself. It is a spirit contracted in its views, selfish in its object. It looks to the aggrandizement of a few even to the destruction of the interests of the whole. The entire remedy is with the people.

Benefits Available to the Discharged Veteran of World War No. 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, although an appreciative government has endeavored to provide for the readjustment of returning veterans to civilian activities and for the rehabilitation of the men who have returned from war broken in body, and to care for those who have become disabled, it can never adequately pay these men for all they have gone through.

The benefits allowable to the veterans of World War No. 2 for disabilities are the same as for those of World War No. 1.

FOR SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITIES—COMPENSATION

The basic rates of compensation allowable range from $10 monthly for a 10 percent disability to $100 for total disability, established as due to service, or 75 percent of this basic rate for disability presumed, but not proved, to be the result of service. The basic awards were increased by 15 percent, effective from June 1, 1944.

A veteran without dependents is limited to $20 per month, regardless of the degree of his disability, during the time he is undergoing treatment or receiving domiciliary care in a Federal Government or State institution.

There are also special statutory rates for stated disabilities, such as loss of hands, loss of feet, or blindness, in several combinations, providing benefits as high as $300 per month. The 15 percent increase does not apply to these awards.

FOR NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITIES—PENSION

A pension of $50 per month is allowed for a permanent and total disability not the result of nor connected with military service and not due to misconduct, increased to $60 if the veteran has been rated permanent and total and has received the pension continuously for 10 years, or when he reaches the age of 65 years.

To be eligible for this benefit, the veteran must have served 90 days during the period of the war, or have been discharged for a disability incurred in service. This pension is not payable if the veteran is unmarried and has an income in excess of $1,000 a year, or is married or has minor children and has an income in excess of $2,500.

BLIND

The Veterans' Administration is authorized to provide seeing-eye or guide dogs for the aid of blind veterans entitled to disability compensation, and to provide mechanical and electronic equipment to aid such veterans in overcoming the handicap of blindness.

RETIREMENT

The laws governing retirement in the Regular services—Army, Navy, and Marine Corps—are made to apply to officers, warrant officers, and enlisted personnel serving in World War No. 2. An officer who becomes unable to perform active service as a result of an incident of service may be retired at 75 percent of the pay of his rank at the time he became incapacitated.

A member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or the Navy Nurse Corps (female) who became disabled in line of duty from performing the duties of a nurse may be retired at 75 percent of the pay of her rank at the time she became so disabled.

INSURANCE

National service life insurance issued to persons serving in World War No. 2 pays benefits only on the death of the insured. It does not, as did the War risk insurance of World War No. 1, provide that the veteran himself shall draw benefits when permanently and totally disabled. There is, however, a provision for a waiver of premiums, upon application by the insured, in case of total disability.

National service life insurance is initially issued on a 5-year level premium basis. It may be converted any time after it has been in force for 1 year, and within the 5-year term period, into an ordinary life, a 20-pay life or a 30-pay life policy, in any amount, in multiples of $500, but not less than $1,000 nor more than the face value of the original policy.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

A program has been set up for the purpose of preparing veterans handicapped by disability to reenter gainful employment. This is in no way related to the provisions under the G. I. bill. Eligibility requirements are—

(A) Active military or naval service at any time on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of World War No. 2.

(B) Discharge or release from active service under conditions other than dishonorable.

(C) Service-connected compensable disability due to World War No. 2 service.

(D) Vocationally handicapped due to disability.

(E) Need for vocational rehabilitation to overcome such handicap.

No training course longer than 4 years will be approved, and no training will be available beyond 6 years after the termination of World War No. 2.

While in training, and for 2 months after it has been determined the veteran is ready to take employment, each veteran will receive allowances, including compensation, of not less than the following:

Disabled person with no dependents, per month	$80
Disabled person with wife but no child, per month	90
Disabled person with wife and 1 child, per month, with $5 more for each additional child	$95

If the disabled person has dependent parents, he will be allowed $10 per month additional for each parent during this training period.

If pension or retirement payments exceed these rates, the pension or retirement will be paid in lieu of training pay.

If the trainee receives wages while in training, payments from the Government may be reduced, but not below the pension or retirement pay to which he is entitled.

The Veterans' Administration is authorized to advance not more than $100 to persons commencing vocational rehabilitation courses, to be paid back without interest, by deductions from future payments of pension or retirement pay.

An injury or aggravation of an injury suffered as a result of training which results in additional disability or death will be compensated on the same basis as disability or death incurred in war service. Application for this benefit must be made within 2 years after the injury.

HOSPITALIZATION

The Veterans' Administration is authorized to furnish domiciliary and hospital care, including needed medical treatment, within the limit of its facilities, to persons discharged or released from service under conditions other than dishonorable who have served in our armed forces.

Priority of admission is afforded war veterans for the treatment of service-connected disabilities. War veterans suffering from ailments not due to service may be admitted for treatment, provided there are accommodations available and they are not able to meet the cost of treatment in private institutions.

Out-patient treatment, medical or dental, including necessary medicines, prosthetic appliances, and other supplies, may be authorized for a service-connected disability, if requested.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

The first benefit available to the veteran of World War No. 2 upon discharge is the mustering-out pay allowance, not available to officers above the rank of captain in the Army or lieutenant, senior grade, in the Navy, men who have had no service except special training or student college program service, and with some other limitations, in the following sums:

First, $300 for persons who, having performed active service for 60 days or more, have served outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska.

Second, $200 for persons with 60 days or more of service who have not served outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska.

Third, $100 for persons who have performed active service for less than 60 days.

To those entitled to $300, one third will be paid at time of discharge and the remainder in equal installments one and two months, respectively, thereafter. To those entitled to $200, one half will be paid at time of discharge and the other half one month later. If entitled to $100, full payment will be made at time of discharge.

This condensed summary of necessity leaves out many details regarding which there may be questions. Help in answering them may be had from the service officers of veterans' organizations, or the Red Cross. Or, inquiries may be addressed to Congressman ERRETT P. SCRIVNER, 316 House Office Building, Washington, D. C., who will be glad to be of assistance in presenting claims and in clarifying any questions which may arise.

Effect of Vegetable Oils on Minnesota Calves

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. CARL ANDERSEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, in reading the testimony of Dr. E. B. Hart, world noted scientist, before the Senate Agriculture Committee when the oleo hearings were held in June 1944, I noted the following statement:

In none of our experiments have we ever found butterfat inferior to any of the animal fats or vegetable oils experimented with. In the present state of our knowledge it is preposterous—let me repeat that—in the present state of our knowledge it is preposterous for any scientist to make the blank statement that it is proven that oleomargarine or vegetable oils have an equivalence to butterfat in nutrition.

I might add something which is not contained in this printed matter as to the experiments of Mr. Gullickson at the University of Minnesota with calves. He fed calves skim milk with butterfat in some cases, and with the vegetable oils in other cases, and he published the records in the Journal of Dairy Science in 1942, and the records show that those animals receiving the vegetable oils grew poorly; in fact, he snatched them from the grave by merely substituting, as they got down, certain animal fats, butterfat, or even lard, and he even used tallow, and it successfully brought those calves away from death. He has not pursued the subject further, and you might ask me why, or how this works, and I would simply have to tell you that I do not know in the present state of our knowledge of nutrition.

Mr. Speaker, with all of the propaganda put out by the Oleo Institute, it would appear that the consumers of America should stop, look, and listen before they permit themselves to be misled by many of the statements of the oleo group.

Communists Plot Control of Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an article which appeared in the Labor Day issue of Labor Views, published in Milwaukee, Wis., by William A. E. Chappelle, Jr.:

COMMUNISTS PLOT CONTROL OF LABOR—C. I. O. POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE CALLED NEW BORING-FROM-WITHIN PLAN OF DISBANDED "REDS"

(By William A. E. Chappelle, Jr.)

Labor Day 1944 finds organized labor threatened with destruction by a Communist-inspired plot to gain control of our Government and all workers' organizations after supposedly having disbanded their party on orders from the Commintern.

This, in effect, is the purpose and plot behind the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. It is a new line of attack; a rejuvenated and more subtle "boring from within" tactic of the American Communists, and it is fooling a lot of union leaders and members who are allowing themselves to be duped into becoming a part of this un-American movement.

One need only look back to that period between 1939 when Hitler and Stalin signed a pact of nonaggression against each other and jointly sliced up Poland between them; and June 1941, when Hitler tore up the nonaggression pact and attacked Russia. During the life of the Hitler-Stalin pact the American Communists and their puppets in the C. I. O. fought against all attempts to prepare for the defense of our country.

CALLED ROOSEVELT "WARMONGER"

During that period these same leaders of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee who are now proclaiming President Roosevelt the "friend of the workingman" and declare a fourth term is imperative for the welfare of organized labor, were loud in their denunciation of Mr. Roosevelt whom they then called "warmonger" and the head of an imperialistic crowd who were out to destroy the rights of the worker.

These same plotters, during the term when Hitler and Stalin were palsey-walsies, were systematically campaigning against every effort of America to build an Army, Navy, and Air Force, and to produce the weapons with which our allies were holding off the enemy while we were developing our "Sunday punch." They addressed an avalanche of letters and telegrams to Members of Congress whenever any measure seeking to prepare America for defense and eventually victory or whenever we made any attempt to provide weapons for our allies.

It was these same C. I. O. Political Action Committee leaders who during the period between 1939 and June 1941 introduced the sit-down strike and the slow-down and other means of holding up production of war materials. The most vivid memory of Wisconsin is the fraudulent 72-day C. I. O. strike at the Allis-Chalmers plant under the leadership of Harold Christofel in which it was revealed that hundreds of fraudulent ballots in favor of a strike had been cast when the strike vote was taken. This strike held up vital equipment for the Navy and the delay has never been overcome.

NOW DEMAND FOURTH TERM

But when Hitler began his war against the Russians in June 1941 these same leaders became enthusiastic supporters of Mr. Roosevelt and his program for defense and war.

And now, Labor Day 1944, we find this new C. I. O. Political Action Committee organizing and spending funds taken from the pay envelopes of the same good Americans who were forced to impede war production in 1939, 1940, and part of 1941. The C. I. O. P. A. C. leaders now demand that their members get behind the campaign to elect Roosevelt to a fourth term.

It was under these same leaders that the split in America's labor organizations came about in the early thirties. Russian born Sidney Hillman, who now heads the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, was a leader in engineering this split.

During the intervening years the C. I. O. grew and became a powerful segment of American economic life. While it still ranks far behind the membership it has succeeded in gathering nearly all of the left-wing labor leaders into its fold, and on this Labor Day 1944, while it is not apparent to most A. F. of L. leaders, Sidney Hillman seems to be plotting to get into a position in the Government from which he can snipe at and eventually crush the A. F. of L. with the aid of his Communist allies.

An awakening of the sincere labor leaders of America is needed at once or Mr. Hillman and his comrades will have done irreparable damage to organized labor.

HURTING LABOR CAUSE

Whether Hillman and his Political Action Committee will be successful is questionable. In spite of their claims of victory in certain political campaigns there is little of fact to prove their claims. Thus far it would seem that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is more of a political liability than an asset.

It appears that some New Deal politicians are using the P. A. C. for whatever votes they may put in the bag. It is just as apparent that the C. I. O. P. A. C. is using the New Deal as the best possible vehicle upon which to ride into power. The prime purpose of the C. I. O. P. A. C. is not the election of Mr. Roosevelt. It is an attempt to get into position to control organized labor.

Win or lose, the C. I. O. P. A. C. is placing American organized labor in a precarious position. It has already inspired much anti-labor legislation and during the next year or two this sort of un-American plotting is bound to bring repercussions that may well set organized labor back 50 years.

Organized labor should recognize the C. I. O. P. A. C. for what it is—a Communist-inspired plot to get control—and begin this Labor Day 1944 to block such intrigue in an effective, truly American manner—denounce it for what it is.

Address of Hon. Ed Rowe, of Ohio, to the Pan-Icarian Brotherhood, at Akron, Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER A. RAMEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. ED ROWE, of Ohio, at the fortieth annual convention of the Pan-Icarian Brotherhood held at the Mayflower Hotel at Akron, Ohio, September 3, 1944:

When you invited me to come and enjoy this fellowship with you, and further invited me to speak to you, I confess my knowledge about your homeland was about nil.

I knew generally of its location and I sort of had the impression from the name Pan-Icarian, that it was a part of Greece.

My conclusion was probably facilitated by that legendary Arcadian Deity—Pan—part goat and part man—the giver of fertility. The mythological god of flock and pastures, the patron of shepherds, forest, and wildlife.

Icarian registers on my mind with like tendency toward a conclusion of something associated with Greece.

I have since learned about this island, the homeland of many of you and your forebears, studding the Aegean Sea, almost on the line which divides Europe and Asia Minor; located a short distance northwest of that small island upon which St. John the Divine interpreted the word of God in the Book of Revelations.

I learned it was by the sturdy and militant effort of the Samians and probably with the help of the Icarians that your deliverance was effected in 1912, and you once again became a part of the mother country Greece.

Those of you who have lived there can no doubt easily visualize in your moments of nostalgic retrospection—or when you're yearning for a sight of those steep mountainsides descending to meet the ocean or sea—yes; visualize, the spires of Phardys—Hypsiles—Atachides—and Melissa towering into the blue heavens from the mid-Aegean channel.

These, together with other mountains running the length of Icaria, whose quick descent continues after meeting the blue waters of the Aegean Sea, until a depth of a 100 fathoms is reached a very short distance from the shore line.

I'm sure it is a dream of pleasure when those among you who have lived and observed the simple sturdy life of these island people can reflect upon the traditions of your homeland.

That life was arduous enough for balanced exercise and good health. The excellent God-given climate upon this little island which lies in the shadows of the Holy Land is a contributing factor in the sturdiness of its people.

Simple diet of grilled fresh fish, the succulent tender meat of lamb and goat, olives, and fresh figs of your own planting, the citrus fruits and raisins ripened in the sun and warm Aegean breezes, the luscious wines diluted to the taste of the thirsty and hungry; all these memories tickle the appetites of the true Icarian.

The afternoon rest or siesta and the journey over winding road to Hagios Kerykos, where sometimes you met the ships which anchored in its cove harbor, bringing news and curious visitors from the outside world.

Yes, my friends; I have learned something of your small island homeland. I know through the eyes of others something about the charcoal burners of past years, the maid servants, the beekeepers, the fruit growers, the wine makers, the very simple, meager, though fruitful life, of the Icarians.

You have migrated to this great country and your children will mingle with my children in its further building.

We are now all of a great national fraternity where the sovereignty is as rich and untrammeled in any one of us as it is in any other.

That really is the greatness of this Nation. It matters not from whence you came, it matters not your race or creed, our national background creates no difference, each of us can qualify by native birth or by living within the law of the land over a stipulated time as an equal sharer in the richest estate of citizenship upon the face of the earth or under God's sun.

I am removed but one generation, as are many of you here, from the Old World, yet there is no office, no place of prominence, no height in the rank of business, art, culture, or science, no place of leadership in the strong armed forces of our country, no public acclaim to which any of us may not aspire and reach if we have the fortitude, ability, perseverance, and the good faith of our fellow citizens.

It has been said that the United States is the great melting pot of all creeds, races, and nationalities. I find myself in disagreement with that conclusion.

I prefer regarding it as a great indistinguishable light of the world and humanity.

It has always been my conception of a melting pot as being a furnace or caldron into which one places various and sundry items and then applies extremely high temperature to melt down whatever you have placed therein. After the process and the cooling you remove from the furnace or caldron one homogeneous mass and sameness resulting from the high temperature of fire applied to the various elements you originally place therein.

That is certainly not the result, as the simile may apply to these great United States. This very meeting belies that conclusion. All over this Nation tonight there are thousands of meetings much like this one wherein the peoples who originated in some other nation with difference of race or creed are clinging to the rich traditions and lore of their native land, or their fathers' native land.

My own people, of Welsh ancestry, have their annual meeting in honor of our patron saint—St. David. There we hear some speaker, who revives the pride in our hearts about our rich traditions. We sing the songs and cite the history and proclaim our worth by telling what our contribution has been to this greatest of nations.

No; we do not come out of the melting pot with a sameness except as it may apply to freedom and liberty.

This great light, to which I referred and the way in which I prefer to regard this Nation of ours, is the incubator to nurture the soul of man. We all know it is the one place where patriotism stems from the firm foundation of liberty, freedom, and justice.

It is because of this liberty, freedom, and justice that we form the great confraternity made up of the component parts of our varied former national fraternities. To this Nation we make our several contributions. It is the place where our aspirations live in the privileged expression we enjoy under this great light of freedom.

The patriotism of a free people under a government which proceeds by the consent of the governed is best expressed in the words of a former President, long since deceased. He said—

"Patriotism should be an integral part of our every feeling at all times, for it is merely another name for those qualities of soul which make a man, in peace or in war, by day or by night, think of his duty to his fellow man and his duty to his nation, through which their and his loftiest aspirations must find their fitting expression."

Oh, yes; this great light, under which you and I bask, gives us the force and warmth of common purpose.

It illumines the dark paths of bigotry so that our footsteps may not wander and brings us to a place where we would design men's religion and foolishly attempt making of ourselves a god.

This great light shines upon and makes bright the broad road of tolerance so that when we travel thereon we may reach out our hand of fellowship to a brother even though he may not be of our exact kind, and help him live in the same way and with the same blessings as we may enjoy ourselves.

It lights the way back to the rich traditions and quickens one's concept of the worth of our forefathers in whose breasts there was a dream, a song, or a prophecy, which is your heritage to proudly lay in the lap of America. From this source has come the arts, the cultures, and the sciences with which we are going forward in our tremendous national effort in the misfortunes of this day.

It is our headlight for the highway of national purpose to which all of us are pledged to travel because the Nation is us and we are the Nation. We are the light and we are the road. We are the moving force, combined as we are of many natures of peoples. It is here that our liberties are equal.

Lincoln said, "True liberties are never intolerant or destructive of equal liberties in others. Men may receive liberties in proportion as their understanding enables them to use them with restraint."

This light gives our share of the liberties we can wisely use and it shows the way to enrich and enhance them.

We are each privileged to come to the place—

When the mind is held clear and the head is held high;
Where knowledge is free;
Where the world is not broken up into fragments by narrow domestic walls;
Where the word comes out from the depths of truth;
Where the clear stream of reason has not lost its way into the dreary desert of dead habits;
Where the mind is led forward by this great light into ever widening thought and action;
Where we can walk in the midst of tempests meeting the emergency without fear or mistrust in ourselves, guided by the star, the light of freedom.

My new friends, my fellow Americans of Icarinan origin, as your fathers came here to this land to produce riches, you too were born here to produce riches by the keenness of mind and strength of will.

I, like you, am a descendant of another people, and all of us who are here assembled, apart in kinship of national origin from you, are of sameness under this great light. We are proud to be Americans and we also have pride in the blood of our forefathers.

We are admonished of the dangers which ever seek to take away from these rich virtues that are ours. The forces are always at work to destroy our unity. The subtle voices are amongst us which would lead us into the darkness. It has been said that "Vigilance is the price of our freedom."

Beware of him who would rise among us to champion that which we already possess. The words of Plato are our warning—

"The people have always some champion whom they set up over them and nurse into greatness. This and no other is the root from which a tyrant springs. When he first springs above the ground he is a protector. In the early days of his power he is full of smiles and salutes everyone he meets. He liberates debtors and distributes land to the people and his followers, and wants to be so kind to everybody."

Beware that you do not trade your liberty for the temporary gift. Franklin said, "They that give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety."

Our challenge is to keep secure the real worth of our cardinal institutions of liberty. We of this great confraternity should always be reminded of the words of the Father of our Country—when he wrote—

"Other misfortunes may be borne or their effects overcome. If disastrous wars should sweep our commerce from the oceans, another generation may renew it; if it exhausts our Treasury, future industry may replenish it; if it desolates and lays waste our fields, still under a new cultivation they will grow green again and ripen to future harvests. It would be but a trifle if the walls of our capital were to crumble, if its lofty pillars should fall and its gorgeous decorations be all covered by the dust of the valley. All these may be rebuilt.

"But who shall reconstruct the fabric of demolished governments?

"Who shall rear again the well-proportioned columns of constitutional liberty?

"Who shall frame together the skillful architecture which unites national sovereignty and States' rights, individual security, and public prosperity?

"No; if these columns fall they will not be raised again. Like the Colosseum and the Parthenon, they will be destined to a mournful and melancholy immortality. Bitterer tears, however, will flow over them than were ever shed over the monuments of Rome or Grecian art; for they will be the monuments of a more glorious edifice than Greece or Rome ever saw, the edifice of Constitutional American Liberty."

Icarians, American Icarians, my hand of fellowship in common purpose is extended to you. Thank you.

New W. P. B. Order Wrecking the Lumber Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, recently the Lumber Division of the W. P. B. issued a new order entitled "L-335 Governing the Production and Distribution of Lumber." Under this order each producer is required to get a certificate before he can sell the product of his mill. The order is having the effect of damming up the production of the small mills throughout the country and unless they get some relief they are all going out of business. The certificates for sale of their production just are not coming through; their lumber is piling up; they can't pay their labor; they do not have room or facilities to carry a heavy backlog of lumber. Lumber today is No. 1 essential and yet this order is blocking production. This is a matter which should have the attention of the committees of the Congress set up for the purpose of protecting the small business enterprises. I am filing a telegram which I today received from one of my lumbermen which gives a graphic picture of the situation:

AUBURN, CALIF., September 5, 1944.

Congressman CLAIR ENGLE,

House of Representatives:

Order L-335 is creating chaotic confusion in every field of western lumber industry. Manufacturers, planing mills, retailers, consumers, and labor are set back alike. It is proving complete failure here and doing opposite from benefit claimed for it. We should return to successful system in effect prior to August 1 when priority system and central procurement agency buying insured first call on all lumber for Government requirement. Crow's Pacific Coast Lumber Digest, August 31, termed the order a complete flop. States unnecessary and not working to satisfaction of anyone. Benefits to war uses is nil because war demand has fallen off so rapidly only a fraction of the war footage remains as was bought under previous order, consequently not needed now. The Digest says it is very harmful.

Production of big mills is being dammed up and blocked with an accumulation of low-grade commons which the Government never did buy to any appreciable extent. Newest amendment exempting number four common helps but why not also exempt three and two commons as well since quantities of three are greater than four and two will soon be a problem.

Nowhere is the effect of the L-335 muddle worse than with the rough lumber producers in your district where many sawmills produce from ten to fifty thousand feet per day of rough lumber. This previously moved directly from the sawmills to be a distributing yard or a remanufacturing plant. These mills are mostly in the mountain with long hauls to railroad or market. The cost of this chain of production is higher than with the big mills but their total production count very large in the total for this State and has been of vital importance in the war effort.

There is not now enough war orders to go around to all the mills and these go to the big mills with full manufacturing facilities. With domestic demand choked by L-335 and no war orders there is little less of market for the rough lumber these many sawmills produce. They can't continue to pile up their lumber indefinitely without income and help is needed quickly from Washington to immediately restore production with the removal of the choke on their market instituted by regulations L-335.

I was in San Francisco Thursday and Friday on behalf of several of these producers as W. P. B. made statement that producers without market should see their regional office. They had no market—they had no orders. Every day Government orders are less. W. P. B. proposes to increase quota of box factories to take some of the slack. Those quotas were already based on regular requirements. Winter is coming on when important maintenance and repair work must be done in public interest everywhere. Why not have a simple, free from red tape, low priority clearance for this work that would not take any essential material from any higher rated war orders which may exist. If lumber is short production can only be kept up by maintenance of a market for it immediately. This would help and at the same time maintain some necessary employment for war industry. Also for manufacturers of auxiliary building materials everywhere whose markets are also suffering from effects from L-335.

Your interest will be thoroughly appreciated by all in the California lumber industry and is most helpful in a tough situation.

WENDELL ROBIE,
Auburn Lumber Co.

Causes of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM
OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address entitled "Causes of War," delivered by me before the Kiwanis Club of Roanoke, Va., September 6, 1944:

Mr. Chairman, members of the Rotary and Kiwanis Clubs and guests, we are living in an hour of momentous happenings. The end of the war, which is rapidly approaching, will pose gigantic problems for the world, and our Nation in particular. How wisely we act in approaching these problems will determine the future peace and security of our country.

Looking to the end of hostilities, Congress has sought to provide in a measure for some of these problems. We have passed, and it has become law, an act for the generous care of the fighting men and women and their dependents. We are in the act of completing action on two other important problems.

Ways and means of disposing of the large surplus stores that will remain on hand, and provisions for reconversion. There are other pressing matters, that will be reached as the situation develops. Smooth and expeditious reconversion is most important. It holds the key to one of our most important domestic problems, that of providing jobs—jobs not only for those who are laid off from war production, but jobs for the returning soldier—jobs not on a gigantic federally operated W. P. A. but secure jobs—jobs in private industry.

Every incentive and assistance must be given private enterprise to get into operation. The Government must get out of business. Government controls must be abandoned or relaxed as rapidly as possible. War agencies must be liquidated, and in short, everything possible must be done to get us back to a normal way of life where the individual citizen will feel that he is once again his own master. So much for the domestic front.

WAR AND PEACE

I wish, however, to draw your attention for a little while to the thing that is uppermost in our minds at the moment, war and peace.

Thomas Paine once said, "This is the hour that tries men's souls." Undoubtedly, the particular hour in the history of the world to which Thomas Paine alluded was a critical hour, but from the viewpoint of this generation, the day in which you and I live is the day of great decisions, decisions that will more profoundly affect the future welfare and happiness of the human race than any that have ever before been made.

COURSE OF THE WAR

On the battle front, success attends our arms. We but wait the inevitable end which will bring complete victory to our cause. Myriads of hands are lifted heavenward and prayers ascend the mercy seat for the early dawning of that day. They are the hands of tiny infants, and of wrinkled age—the soft white hands of women; the caloused hands of those who work. All are stretched upward with strained eyes and a fervent prayer that this unspeakable horror may end. In the language of the patriarch of old, "How long, O Lord, how long?"

Every day that this struggle is extended, means the loss of more precious lives on the altar of war. It means more broken hearts, more vacant firesides, more blasted lives.

War is a horrible monster. Its blighting breath sears the human soul; dulls the human intellect, and spreads ruin and devastation wherever it strikes. It is the only game that men play where everyone loses. No one is the winner in the game of war. We must never permit this world to be plunged into another awful war.

EFFORTS FOR PEACE

One thousand nine hundred years ago the Prince of Peace preached "Peace on Earth." Although we Christians give lip service to that exalted ideal, yet candor compels us to admit that the Christian era is a record of one war after another. Our own "peace loving" country has had seven major wars in its brief existence. It makes us wonder if democracy is a cure for war. There is one thing which I think we can put down as a fairly established fact, and that is, that another war in another 25 years will practically destroy the human race.

Individually and collectively as a nation we abhor war. Some have tried and labored to prevent war and to establish peace. We sent our sons in the First World War to fight the "war that was to end wars." Our great World War President, Woodrow Wilson, living away ahead of his time, broke his great heart in an effort to convince his fellow Americans that there was only one way to end war, and to establish peace, and that was by concerted action among the powerful nations of the earth. I am thinking at the moment of another great American, Frank B. Kellogg, who was Secretary of State in the Collidge Cabinet. History will not record Kellogg as a very great Secretary of State, or a man of outstanding brilliance, but he had one great dream, and that was to outlaw war. In the face of many obstacles, much discouragement, and many handicaps, on an August afternoon in 1928, in Paris along with the diplomats of other nations, the Kellogg Peace Treaty was signed. Kellogg's dream, however, did not bear fruit, but it can be recorded that it did not fail until it had been tried by another American of his time, Henry L. Stimson, then Secretary of State under Hoover, who is now our great Secretary of War. Stimson saw clearly the signs of approaching wars, and he rightly believed that if the many minor wars which were then heading up could be averted, that it might be possible to prevent a world conflagration. Today the hearts and the hopes of the American people center in the efforts that are being made by representatives of the leading nations of the earth, now assembled at Dumbarton Oaks and who are laboring in the cause—laying the pattern for world collaboration which is the only effective way of securing world peace.

REMOVE CAUSES OF WAR

War will not be averted, however, nor peace established merely by the signing of imposing documents or making eloquent professions. We must remove, as far as we can, some of the causes of war. In 1922, it was the firm belief of many Americans that if we could stop the mad rush for armaments, that we would remove the most irritating cause of war. Hence, there gathered in the city of Washington, an imposing array of representatives. They were there from Germany and Japan, Italy, France, Great Britain, and America. They signed a great treaty on limitation of naval armaments. Under that treaty, America scrapped her Navy and Germany tore up some blueprints. The representatives of Germany and Japan must have gotten a great laugh out of our pious action. It opened wide the door for them to begin the construction of a gigantic war machine, which, a few years later was to spread terror over the world.

One of the causes of war is racial and national prejudice. One cannot underestimate the great difficulties that will be had in overcoming this very human cause of distrust and suspicion.

TRADE WARS

Another cause of war, and one which I desire to comment upon is trade and commerce. The tension of the world can be released and good will be established among nations only by opening up the channels of trade. This has been demonstrated by the experiences of many centuries. The effect of the contraction of trade by exhorbitant tariffs, by monetary disorders, by embargoes, quotas, and bounties and what not, is to set the people fighting each other at home and abroad in a desperate struggle to keep their share of a diminishing national income. Such a situation is a fertile field of operation for Communists, Fascists, and extremists of all sorts. Men resort to violence when their standards of living are being destroyed. A liberal and generous democratic society is one in which men feel free, generous and have opportunity; it is dissension, depression, restriction of opportunity that arouses violence, intolerance and enmities. This simple fundamental is going to be particularly true in the era following the present war. Thoughtful citizens give much consideration to this subject.

On the statement of fundamentals, I would like to quote a distinguished American educator, Harry D. Gideons, president of Brooklyn College:

"After the war there will be a crying demand for America's mass-production goods and farm products from every country in the world. If we maintain a liberal policy regarding imports, this demand can create thousands of post-war jobs in this country, utilizing industrial and agricultural capacity which otherwise would be idle.

"But to export we must be willing to import. Hence, the renewal of the trade-agreements program is essential for maintenance of employment and business activity at a high level after the war. Moreover, in the Atlantic Charter the United States is pledged to the long-run principle that all nations, great and small, should have access on equal terms to the trade and raw materials of the world.

"Every country, therefore, if it wishes to promote the expansion of world trade, which is a fundamental condition for the establishment of a durable peace, must show greater willingnes to accept the goods of other countries. In other words, the lowering of tariffs under the leadership of great trading nations is an essential means of realizing the program of economic and political cooperation endorsed by the United Nations."

The American policy, fortunately for us, has been firmly established. Under the leadership of Secretary Hull, we had, up to the present world conflict, since 1934, made notable progress in building the framework of trade treaties with the principal nations of the earth and more particularly our South American neighbors. In 9 years, during which the reciprocal trade-treaties program has been in operation, trade treaties have been concluded with 27 countries. Over 65 percent of the total foreign trade of the United States has been carried on with countries with which reciprocal trade agreements have been concluded. The United Kingdom and Canada, respectively, have been the largest and second largest customers for American exports.

THE SUCCESS OF THE TRADE-AGREEMENTS PROGRAM

The trade-agreements program had to make its way against a general deterioration in international relations and the strong currents of barter trading and other nationalistic excesses which tended to paralyze foreign trade generally.

The United States was faced with a choice between the use of its economic power in an ultimately self-defeating effort to coerce other nations into maintaining trade with us or to offer them an example of leadership in reestablishing world trade on the basis of cooperative action. To the everlasting credit—and self-interest—of the United States, it chose the latter course.

The course chosen in 1934, and held to since then, has paid dividends of two kinds: Expanded trade, with all that it has meant in terms of income, pay rolls, and employment, and, at the same time, improved general relations with other countries, which have meant much to us in time of war and which will continue to mean much to us not only between now and complete victory of the United Nations over the Axis powers, but also in the years of peace.

Recently we had before the Congress the question of whether or not America would continue the trade treaty program. It was widely endorsed. The United States Chamber of Commerce, on behalf of commerce and industry—the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Workers on behalf of labor—the American Farm Bureau, and many other civic organizations on behalf of the public—all came with a most impressive testimony to this American policy of world collaboration in the field of trade.

The case was so clearly and convincingly stated by Secretary Hull, that I herewith quote a portion of his statement before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives.

"Important as was the trade-agreements program in the past, important as it has been and will be from a broader point of view, it will be more significant than ever, from the viewpoint of our own material interest, when the present fighting stops. * * * Foreign markets will be very important to us then and will continue to be essential as far as anyone can see ahead. It will be well to have in being and in working order a tested and tried instrument for obtaining the reduction of foreign-trade barriers and the elimination of discriminations against our products.

"As we look into the future, it is this theme of international cooperation that should be uppermost in our minds, if we really want to make sure that another world conflict is not to be ahead of us after we win this war.

"When the day of victory comes, we and other nations will have before us a choice of courses to follow. Basically, that choice will be, as it was in 1918, between, on the one hand, extreme nationalism, growing rivalries, jealousies, and hatreds, with the ultimate certainty of another and even more devastating war; and, on the other hand, increased international cooperation in a wide variety of fields, and at least the hope of secure peace for our children.

"No one can give a promise that secure peace will really prevail. It is much harder to make the peace secure than it is to wage successful war. Many wars have been fought and won, by many nations, but not yet has any nation made its peace secure and enduring. No one nation, no two nations can do this. For war is an international affair; in a world of many nations its prevention requires international collaboration. In the new world of the airplane all nations are the near neighbors of all others. In such a world any one strong industrial country has power to plunge the world into war with devastating suddenness and violence. To keep the peace secure will require the resolute and continuous collaboration of all law-abiding nations. It is a hard way and a long way, but it is the only hopeful way there is to prevent war.

"Of the various necessary fields of international collaboration one of the most essential is the field of economic life. The goods and services by means of which men live must be abundant, and they must be well distributed. If the material basis of civilization fails, we must not anticipate that human beings will be civilized or peaceful. Solid and lasting friendships between large groups of people require mutual willingness to cooperate in the fundamental business of earning a living. That is why it is so essential, in the words of the Atlantic Charter—to bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field with the object of securing, for all, improved labor standards, economic advancement, and social security.

"This objective, and the balance of the charter, have now been endorsed by all of the United Nations. That action was taken by the hard-headed and realistic men who guide these governments, not by reason of humane sentiments alone, but because they recognize that the only way to attain these ends is through cooperative action.

"Stable peace and economic warfare will not mix. We know that, now, from bitter experience. Just as we must work together to set up and operate the necessary machinery to maintain peace, we must work together to make the years of peace fruitful for ourselves and for others."

More recently, in May to be exact, the Secretary of State summed up the situation in the following statement delivered on the occasion of the observance of National Foreign-Trade Week:

"Such an international system of trade and financial relations embodying sound economic standards and the principles of justice, must be created and made effective in order to support any international organization that may be set up to keep and enforce the peace. Otherwise, the structure of international security would be threatened with collapse as a result of economic disorder and conflict.

"Leadership toward a new system of international relationships in trade and other economic affairs will devolve very largely upon the United States because of our great economic strength. We should assume this leadership and the responsibility that goes with it, primarily for reasons of pure national self-interest. We ourselves cannot live in prosperity and security in our own country while people in other countries are suffering want and being driven to despair by economic hardship. If we are to have jobs for all our workers and markets for all our goods, people in other countries must likewise have opportunity to produce to their maximum capacity and to pay us, with the fruits of their efforts, for the things we want to sell them.

"The Government of the United States and other United Nations governments are endeavoring to make as rapid progress as possible toward the objectives set forth in the Atlantic Charter, and the mutual-aid agreements, and the Moscow and Tehran Declarations. In carrying out this great task, they need and must have the support of the people whose interests they serve.

"In this matter foreign traders have a special responsibility extending far beyond the mere safeguarding and enhancement of their own business interests. They have a special knowledge of foreign trade and its place as a necessary support of international prosperity and world security. They can contribute much to the establishment of a sound system of trade relations among nations by sharing their knowledge and understanding with other citizens and groups. Observance of National Foreign-Trade Week is one means of carrying out this responsibility."

So much for the necessity of removing competition for markets and foreign trade as an irritation that in the past has sown the seeds of war.

WAR INSURANCE

All signs point to a great determination on the part of the United Nations to take every precaution humanly possible to see to it that there is not another world war. I think I see a sincere effort on the part of the great nations to erect a world state in the hereafter wherein nations can dwell together in peace and tranquillity—and where every nation, no matter how small, will be respected and protected in its pursuit of happiness in its own way and according to its own concepts. Of course, we all do hope and pray that the race has learned its bitter lesson—the lesson of the tragedy and the futility of war, but what if, in spite of all of these precautions—what if notwithstanding all of the imposing commitments and inspiring professions and legalistic treaties—what if in spite of all of that, human nature asserts itself and some Hitler of the future appears upon the horizon with ideas about conquest and power? Will we be where we were when this scrap started? Will we again have to start from scratch to build for our defense? Will we again have to send the flower of our land into battle to fight for peace? I hope not. I pray not. If we do, then in my humble judgment we will have been faithless to those who are giving their lives in this conflict.

Patrick Henry once said, "I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience. I know of no way judging the future but by the past." And so say I. I have seen this thing happen once, and, insofar as my humble efforts may have any influence, it shall not happen again.

Some of us through the years have pleaded for a strong military establishment as insurance against war. I can tell you, though, it was hard going, even right up to Pearl Harbor. We won't go into details at this time.

On February 5, 1927, 17 years ago, I addressed the House of Representatives on the subject. I termed the subject of the speech at the time, Peace by Preparedness. I take the liberty of quoting the concluding paragraphs of that address.

"Until such time as all nations of the earth can meet and agree upon some plan to reduce naval and military strength, I want to see America go forward with a steady, orderly, and progressive strengthening of her Military Establishment on the seas, on land, and in the air, so that at all times she may not only be willing but ready and able to defend her traditions and protect her citizens and their property."

"I have said that in the present state of world affairs there is little to lead us to expect anything approaching universal peace in the near future. Such a statement seems to be abundantly justified when we inventory the happenings of the day in Europe, shot through as it is by passions, misunderstandings, and ambitious rulers thirsting for power and domain.

"AMERICA'S MISSION

"America must ever be ready with her good offices, her economic strength, and her political prestige to counsel and advise upon an amicable settlement of these varied disputes; and while a realization of the dream for universal peace, certainly so far as it affects Europe, may lie for future generations to enjoy, yet we can have peace in America.

"PEACE BY PREPAREDNESS

"America can be spared the wasteful effects of another war. American boys can be spared the awful experience of the boys in the recent war. American homes can be spared the horror and the heartaches that ever follow in the wake of conflict. We can be spared all of this by putting ourselves in such a position with reference to our national defense that the nations of the earth may know that not only does America stand for peace among the nations of the earth but that she demands peace for her own territory; that America will protect her citizens and their property wherever they may rightfully be; that not only does America stand for freedom of the seas for all nations but that she will demand freedom of the seas for her own commerce; that not only will America refrain from involving herself in European entanglements but that she is in a position to successfully resist any effort to cause her to be so involved. It has many times happened in the history of the world that the only way to have peace was to fight for it, and the poet has said, 'He only deserves freedom and liberty who is prepared to win it for himself every day.' No, sirs; the time is not yet come when America can strip herself of her arms and stand naked and defenseless before the world, relying for protection only upon the beauty and glory of her innocence and the lofty ideals for which she stands."

Those were my sentiments 17 years ago. Time and experience has, I think, vindicated those remarks.

POST-WAR MILITARY POLICY

In providing for this post-war Military Establishment a number of things must be considered. For that purpose we have set up in Congress a Select Committee on Post-war Military Policy. I have the honor to be chairman of that committee. We are currently conducting interesting studies, and are having splendid support from the armed services.

One important consideration will be the expense of the Military Establishment. The Nation will be groaning under a terrific debt caused by war expenditures. Everything possible must be done, consistent with national security, to lighten that burden. In this connection we are giving thought to the following:

1. The size, and relative component parts of the post-war establishment. Obviously one cannot fix these elements with exactness until the future diplomatic developments show what our commitments are going to be in the new world order of collaboration and cooperation. We are, however, making notable progress in the study. For instance, we believe it is quite possible to materially, if not drastically, reduce our requirements for the Regular Establishment by use of highly trained reserve force, in all branches—that is, Army, Navy, and Air. Such a procedure would call for periodic refresher training of the present members of our armed forces, who are mustered out, in good physical condition—for a much more sympathetic and liberal treatment of our National Guard organizations, and perhaps for some logical and attractive form of universal military training for the youth of our land.

In addition to this we are convinced that we can profit much by the lesson of unified command, which we are learning from this war. We have had most interesting hearings on this subject. Within the services there is a wide difference of opinion as to what can or should be done. There is undoubtedly, however, an area of agreement in the situation whereby certain consolidations, coordinations, and avoidance of duplications, there can not only be great savings to the taxpayer but much greater efficiency in the services. We are pursuing those studies.

In conclusion, it all sums up to this: Americans do not wish again to be involved in war. We shall use every possible means to settle disputes by amicable means, but, failing in those efforts, we propose to be ready by the use of military force to prevent a recurrence of the horrible tragedy of war.

The Amazing Record of Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 5, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, an eloquent tribute to labor's amazing record of production from the pen of Toney E. Flack, published of the West Side Messenger, of Indianapolis, is a first column feature of the September 1 issue of that publication written in commemoration of Labor Day.

No one can read that article without a thrill of pride over the magnificent way labor has responded in the production of the implements of war which have kept the United Nations supplied without a break with the most modern equipment from the opening of the world conflict until the present hour when victory is almost in sight.

By unanimous consent of the House I present for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Mr. Flack's recital of the record of war production. It is as follows:

Little has been said in favor of the great mass of laboring people who have made up the vast industrial army on the home front that has made possible the achievements of our fighting men and women in the European and Pacific theaters of war, as well as the untold amount of supplies for our allies made possible by the labor and craftsmanship of millions of hard-working American men and women. These toilers make up the great industrial army of our country, and to them this Labor Day we pay tribute for their part in this great war that we are engaged in and which even now we seem to be victorious in.

Our great army of productioneers have won major victories against the enemy by breaking all past records for the output of guns, planes, tanks, ships, ammunition, and military supplies. Make no mistake about it—our successful invasion drives in Africa, Sicily, Italy, France, and the Pacific, as well as the powerful offensive of our allies, never could have gotten to first base without the vast supplies of war equipment produced by our American labor.

Just as surely as America's fighting forces are outfighting the enemy, the superiority of American armed equipment, both in quantity and quality, has swung the tide of victory to our side in this war and will keep it there.

The criticism of labor for strikes is not warranted to the extent that it has been in the past. In 1943 strikes in manufacturing and construction resulted in a loss of manpower of less than one-fourth of 1 percent of the manpower actually used, whereas manpower contributed by labor in that year exceeded that used in 1939 by 76 percent. These figures speak for themselves in defense of the vast army of labor on the home front.

If the figures were available for the number of servicemen absent without leave during the year of 1943, then I feel certain there would be less reason for criticism of labor and strikes.

Here are a few statistics obtained from official Government reports of the accomplishments of labor in the war effort:

Since July, 1940, American workmen have produced more than $130,000,000,000 worth of planes, tanks, guns, ships, and ammunition.

The average output per worker was 30 to 35 percent higher last April than in December 1942.

In west coast airplane plants taken as a whole, the average output per worker has increased 51.4 percent in the past 3 years.

Twelve merchant vessels were built in American shipyards during the entire month before Pearl Harbor. Now we are building them at the rate of 1 a day. Our merchant fleet now has more than 3,000 ships.

Our fighting fleet has been tripled in size since the beginning of the preparedness program. The United States Navy had 1,140 combatant ships as of last month, the greatest armada in world history.

Such statistics may sound dry and uninspiring. But they mean a great deal to the boys facing the enemy overseas. In many cases they mean the difference between life and death. The American doughboy, seeing the vast fleets of fighting planes and fighting ships which are protecting him and witnessing with his own eyes the superiority of his fighting equipment over anything the enemy can throw at him, must experience a deep sense of gratitude to his friends at home who are backing him up so effectively.

But the American worker seeks no special credit for his services in the war effort. This is his war, just as it is every other American's. He is doing his bit and he is going to keep on doing it, regardless of criticism or praise. He knows that victory is the only thing that counts.

Labor's support of the war effort is not limited to the production program. Laboring men and women are purchasing War bonds to the limit of their ability, they are contributing generously to all war relief activities, they are giving their blood to the Red Cross, and they are actively supporting every administrative and legislative policy which will help speed the day of victory.

Labor, too, has its casualties in this war. Labor casualties incurred since Pearl Harbor while serving on so-called safe jobs here at home on the production lines, now have reached the staggering total figure of 4,681,700, according to official figures supplied by the War Production Board. (We only have to recall the number of accidents right here in Indianapolis in our local plants to realize the truth of these figures.) Of the above number, 36,500 have lost their lives while 212,300 have become permanently disabled.

We take this opportunity to commend American laborers and labor leaders and organizations for the splendid part that they have taken in the war to make possible the victories our fighting men have experienced and enjoyed to date.

Oleo Trust Threatens Nebraska Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1944

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor of representing a district in the State of Nebraska that is recognized as one of the leading livestock districts of our Nation; livestock and its products, including beef, milk, eggs, and poultry, representing a large percentage of the agricultural income of our State.

Today I wish to address myself to the importance of the dairy industry and the threat to this industry that is becoming more apparent each day here in Washington.

Nebraska last year produced over 3,000,000,000 pounds of milk, about 100,000,000 pounds of butter and about 2,500,000 pounds of cheese. For several years I have watched the propaganda and advertising carried on by the Oleo Trust whose headquarters are here in Washington. The South is in the saddle and the producers of cottonseed oil are becoming bolder and bolder each day in their attempt to promote oleo at the expense of butter. The Oleo Trust tried to put through a bill this present session of Congress under the guise of being a war measure. Cheap political supporters tried to promote the oleo legislation on the basis of being a war need. It was disclosed that all of the oleomargarine is being made and marketed that can be made with the oil which is allocated to the industry by the War Reclamation Board during this time. The Oleo Trust seems to have considerable support in the present administration.

On July 5, 1940, the United States Department of Agriculture put on a radio skit in which they extolled the value of oleo. This was done on your time and with your facilities and at your expense.

Oleo, my friends, is being served in the Agriculture Department cafeteria in Washington this very day. In one breath these new dealers say oleo is as good as butter and in the next breath put 2 points on oleo and 16 points on butter. The broad question involved in this problem is whether vegetable oils are going to supplant animal fats in the markets of this country or whether the dairy industry should be allowed to have their natural market to which they are entitled. Much misleading propaganda is being furnished.

The Oleo Trust not only maintains a headquarters and lobby here in Washington but there is also another organization that is representing the cottonseed oil interest with headquarters and lobby here as well. The whole oleo industry has been based on deceit and deception. They are trying to change the properties of the product somewhat and the Oleo Trust want it called margarine instead of oleo, at the present time. It appears they want to change the sex as they used to call it Ole and now they want to call it Margie.

Let us analyze a few of the facts in connection with this product. The oleo makers inject some vitamin A into oleo to make it have some of the properties of butter and then they put in some diacetyl acid to make it taste like butter and then give it a shower bath in skim milk to make it smell like butter and then try and make the public believe it tastes like butter. In fact the Oleo Trust in their report shows that they used 74,000,000 pounds of milk in the manufacture of oleo in 1942. Even publications of the present pro-oleo United States Department of Agriculture shows the same amount of 74,000,000 pounds of milk. This is skim milk and is so admitted by the Oleo Trust.

A Nebraska dairyman that would advertise skim milk as milk would soon be in the toils of the law.

Here is another fact. All oleo is not fortified. What is fortified has 9,000 international units of vitamin A injected into it. Many advertisements claim this is as much vitamin A as is contained in butter. Many loose speakers say it has more vitamin A than has butter. I received information from the Agricultural Research Administration, Bureau of Human Nutrition and Home Economics and they say:

> Butter has been found quite variable in vitamin A content. An average value of summer butter is about 20,000 international units per pound and for winter butter 11,000 international units per pound.

This is conclusive proof that butter contains considerably more vitamin A than does oleo. The same Bureau of Human Nutrition and Home Economics says:

> The Food and Drug Administration does not advocate the use of preservatives such as sodium benzoate and tried to discourage their use. According to law, small quantities may be used—one-tenth of 1 percent. However, this must be declared on the label. A report has been published covering investigations made in 1908 and 1909 which reaffirms the above statement. It is known as F. I. D. Report 104 in the Department of Agriculture. This report is now out of print, but Food and Drug Administration can have a photostatic copy made if you so desire.

There were 215,000 pounds of benzoate soda put in the oleo of America in 1942, according to the report of the Oleo Institute. A really good food should not need a preservative and most assuredly should not require as much embalming fluid as oleo evidently needs.

The council on foods and nutrition of the American Medical Association on August 22, 1942, says that "butter contains from 50 to 500 international units of vitamin D per pound." This article also says that "oleomargarine is practically devoid of vitamin D."

THE DAIRY SITUATION

The time has come for the dairymen of this country to realize that there is not more in 100 pounds of milk, so far as nutrition is concerned, than is found in 5 pounds of butter plus 8 pounds of skim milk, 13 pounds of powdered whole milk, 10 pounds of cheese, or in 50 cans or pounds of evaporated or condensed milk. The time has come when every milk producer, regardless of the outlet for his milk and regardless of whether he lives in Nebraska, California, Wisconsin, or New York, must realize the dependence of one on the other. While no bogey scientist will come out for filled milk as yet, you can expect this step if and when oleo is given the chance to replace butter. We have considerable Federal legislation against the manufacture of filled cheese. The dairy industry of America can be assured of one thing, and that is if the Oleo Trust is able to get through their legislation and ruin the butter industry, filled-milk interests and filled-cheese interests will not be far behind in their efforts to break down all protective legislation.

Many people that get off on a tangent in their thinking even now try to make one believe that skim milk is superior to whole milk. Surely skim milk is a good food as it as a powder contains 35 percent of a splendid animal protein. Cottage cheese contains most of the food value to be found in skim milk. Experiments have long ago proved that growing children must have skim milk supplemented by butterfat for proper growth and as a protective food.

THE WASHINGTON LEGISLATIVE SITUATION

Every effort is being made to push through some type of oleo legislation this session of Congress. The heroic work of the Honorable CLIFFORD R. HOPE, of Kansas, as ranking Republican member on the Agriculture Committee, has been able to curb the program of the Oleo Trust. The oleo interests came within two votes on the Agriculture Committee of having success during this Congress.

The Oleo Trust appeared before the Agricultural Committee and tried to deceive its members and lead them to believe a lot of things that were not based on facts. They did not start to inject this vitamin A into oleo until 1938 and yet as you know long before this time the Oleo Trust was trying to deceive the people into believing that even then it was equal to butter.

THE C. I. O. AND C. I. O. OLEO APPROACH

The C. I. O. appears before all our committees of Congress in support of oleo. Here is what their representative Mr. H. S. Haddock testified before the Small Business Committee:

Oleomargarine has a greater food value than butter today.

Speaking of butter, he said:

It should be rolled back to 25¢ a pound.

In answer as to what a farmer would get for his milk, he said:

A farmer at 25 cents a pound for butter, if he utilized all of his milk products, should make 12 cents per pound.

He also said:

I think the facts are available to show that during this time the country would be much better off if they had stopped producing the butter altogether, and I will make that as a positive statement.

Here, then, we find the C. I. O. lined up with the Oleo Trust trying to undermine the dairy industry. The C. I. O. has found it cannot organize the farmers, but evidently think they could organize the oleo makers.

The dairy industry is one of our great industries, representing some $3,000,000,000 a year, and yet these C. I. O. self-styled experts testify that we ought not to make any butter at all. The United States Department of Agriculture must be cooperating with them because their rulings have surely reduced the production of butter in our country.

CONCLUSION

This vegetable oil versus animal fat controversy is causing a very serious situation. If the Oleo Trust, with the help of the C. I. O.'ers, can get oleo legislation passed, then the filled milk and the filled cheeses are sure to follow.

The oil in oleo is being subsidized by the present administration for an amount twice that obtained by the oleo tax. This tax is about $2,000,000 per year.

When science proves the claims of the oleo promoters, there will be ample time then for the consumers to buy their wares. The milk producers of the Nation can and should willingly yield to science. But the dairy industry should not yield one step to any group that has had the background of deceit and deception the oleo people have had and not until science proves the facts beyond doubt.

When powdered whole milk is offered to the public, it can be reconstituted and a saving to the law-income group will be effected that is three times more of a saving than could be made by buying oleo instead of butter.

Nebraska butter is recognized in the butter trade as without a superior in our country. It is hoped that the dairymen of Nebraska and our Nation become aware of the danger before it is too late.

The beef producer also has an interest in this situation. Formerly considerable beef products were used in the manufacture of oleo but now the cheaper vegetable oils are being used. The packers in the oleo business may not be so enthusiastic in supporting fortified protein as they are in fortified oleomargarine. The vegetable-protein people are trying even now to follow the lead of the Oleo Trust and inject vitamins into vegetable protein such as soybean meal and trying to prove that it is the equal to meat.

The injectors of vitamins into vegetable proteins may cause the meat industry the same troubles that the injectors of vitamins into oleo have caused the butter men of our country. Remember ladies and gentlemen there is only one substitute for good Nebraska butter and that is good Nebraska butter and there is only one substitute for good Nebraska beef, pork, and poultry and that is good Nebraska beef, pork, and poultry.

There is not much use of talking about a post-war agriculture until we know who is going to head the agricultural policy of our Nation. We want a market with the natural products of our State, and I or no one else wants to deprive anyone of the chance of eating oleo if he wants to eat it but I repeat that we cannot allow legislation to pass that will give the big Oleo Trust a chance to sell their synthetic product in unfair competition with the natural products of our land.

Just Another Squabble or Part of the Plan?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, recently another one of those interdepartmental "rows" which have characterized President Roosevelt's New Deal agencies and which have so hindered the war effort came to public attention.

After a period of rumor of existing dissension between Donald Nelson, War Production Board Chairman, and his Executive Vice Chairman, Charles E. Wilson, on Friday Wilson resigned, accusing Nelson of having failed to keep his promises to vindicate Wilson of charges of opposing reconversion and stating that Nelson himself delayed reconversion through a policy of procrastination. Wilson said that, as long ago as 8 or 9 months, he had submitted the only reconversion plan which W. P. B. has and that some 20 weeks elapsed before he could get Nelson's O. K. on the plan.

The President had just this week announced that Nelson would be sent on an important, special mission to China. Nelson's friends, recalling WALLACE'S recent trip to China and his subsequent dumping overboard by the new dealers, immediately began speculating on the meaning of this trip and expressed the thought that Nelson was being kicked in the teeth; that he was being eased out of the chairmanship of W. P. B.

The President at first attempted to refute these rumors, but at his Friday press conference and as Nelson left the Capital on the first lap of his China trip, asked whether he expected Nelson to resume his duties as head of W. P. B. after his trip, the President replied that Nelson's mission was most important; that he regarded the question as an "iffy" question, did not know, and that it was sort of "iffy" to say what was going to happen in the future.

Thirty-six-year-old Julius A. Krug has been named by the President as acting W. P. B. chief. Before entering the Navy, Krug was W. P. B.'s program vice chairman and has served also as chief power engineer and manager of power for the Tennessee Valley Authority. The press states that he is "one of the most ardent new dealers," and further says:

President Roosevelt yesterday clearly indicated the War Production Board is being taken out of the hands of the businessmen who directed the most tremendous war materials program in history and is being turned over to New Deal bureaucrats to pilot the vital problems of post-war reconversion.

In this connection, the comment of David Lawrence, an eminent columnist and the editor of the United States News, is interesting. In his article on the W. P. B. intrigue, Mr. Lawrence writes:

President Roosevelt, floundering in a sea of rumors and political pressures, unable to make up his mind to clean house in the top floor of the War Production Board and put it on an efficient basis, accepted the resignation of Charles E. Wilson after the latter had pointedly referred to the dissension inside the Board.

Whether Mr. Roosevelt intends to do anything now about the intrigue is not known but certainly he appears to have sided with the intriguers. What it all boils down to is the fact that certain new dealers who have socialistic ideas about using the surplus property on a "production for use" basis in competition with industry, are finally in control of policy in the War Production Board. They have schemed for months to weaken Donald Nelson and to get rid of Charles E. Wilson. They have the ear of the White House or somebody in the President's entourage who has in turn the ear of the President.

* * * * *

It turns out now that the plot to get Donald Nelson out of town was hatched by some of the ardent new dealers themselves and that their hope was to get rid of Charles E. Wilson by aggravating him into a resignation while Donald Nelson was away in China. This would mean the elevation of some new dealer whom the cabal wanted to put in power in the War Production Board.

* * * * *

This correspondent called attention to the same kind of intrigue when Ferdinand Eberstadt was summarily removed last year as vice chairman by Donald Nelson. The Government lost the services then of one of the ablest young men in the country. It was made to appear that the friction was between Mr. Wilson and Mr. Eberstadt, when, as a matter of fact, the effort was to get rid of one executive from the business world and then concentrate on the other.

Just what purpose is behind all the intrigue is not clear, except that various new dealers have not been content to stand idly by while such huge properties as have been established in the various war plants are available.

The new dealers, supporters of a fourth term, have had a great deal to say about the inadvisability of changing horses in the middle of the stream. Now, when the vital problems of reconversion are demanding solution, what justification will they offer for depriving W. P. B. and the Nation of the services of Nelson and Wilson?

Production Record in Jackson, Mich.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, the Second Congressional District, which it is my privilege to represent in Congress, is one of the busiest national defense areas in the country. The mammoth Ford Willow Run and kindred war industries have created a general manpower shortage problem in this area. Jackson, the largest city in the district, has been exceptionally free from labor disputes and dissension, and all Michigan residents are proud of this record.

The Labor Day editorial of the Jackson (Mich.) Citizen-Patriot is well worth reading, and I submit it to the House. It is as follows:

LABOR DAY

Contemplating another Labor Day, the automatic first thought is the continuing obligation of labor and management to the winning of the war.

Jackson has a proud record in this respect. The very fact that nearly all of our industries are closed today is evidence that schedules have been maintained or exceeded. Even the plants which find it necessary to forego the holiday have the satisfaction of knowing that the pressure for their output is national rather than local. Jackson workmen and management have not fallen down.

Our local record of industrial relations has been as good as—we suspect better than—any other city in the southern Michigan area. We have gone many months without industrial disturbance of any moment. This is a tribute to the leadership and the personnel of the C. I. O. and A. F. L. unions and as well to management which, it is fair to assume, has kept its agreements else trouble would have developed.

Recently we have had an outstanding example of cooperation between unions and employers in the local effort to obtain added manpower for critical industries. In the same splendid spirit labor has taken a major part in other community enterprises, notably in the financing and management of the war chest, which is as it should be.

But Labor Day, when looked at from the national standpoint, presents a challenging study.

Representatives of the C. I. O. and A. F. of L., after visiting the French war front, recently reported that soldiers are not antiunion. That is a defensive statement. It implies that the public had thought otherwise, and there is some justification for that feeling. In truth, it was R. J. Thomas, head of the U. A. W.-C. I. O. and one of the leaders who reported from France—it was Mr. Thomas who warned his union many months ago that there must be no more strikes because an embattled America was losing sympathy for unionism by reason of interruptions in production, although the vast majority of workmen stuck loyally to their jobs.

Regardless of the word from the labor leaders who have been abroad, organized labor definitely has a job to hold and justify public confidence.

It isn't only the fact of wartime strikes in munitions plants which have weakened public respect and faith in unions. It is the lack of integrity among certain unions.

Samuel Gompers, who did more than any man to establish union labor on a high plane and to win progress for the workingman, held to one basic theory in all relations between labor and management—the pledge of the union must be kept.

That was axiomatic among the stronger unions and was a basic reason for their strength. Once a contract was made, it was not to be violated.

But in recent years violation of contractural agreements has become so common as to be scarcely newsworthy. Most recent was the strike at the Highland Park Ford plant. The union had a contract with the company. That contract provided specifically for grievance machinery, including arbitration of difficulties which could not be otherwise settled. But the union ordered and carried out a strike without first using the grievance machinery or calling for arbitration of its disagreements, if any, with management. The same story could be written about 80 percent of wartime strikes; and in many cases the strikers have been A. F. of L. unions, despite the Gompers tradition.

Another problem which modern unionism must face is the left-wing campaign to use labor organizations as the front for class warfare. Such class warfare has in mind not the elevation of workers to a higher economic status but the destruction of the present social order. It is a revolutionary movement, yet union leaders, who do not themselves believe in the theories involved, lend themselves to class warfare, ranging worker against boss and callouses against white collars. The inevitable ultimate goal of such a program is destruction of unionism, because in the kind of social order which class war envisages there can be no labor organizations here any more than there are in Russia.

The present adventure of the C. I. O. in politics is another experiment of dubious wisdom which runs directly contradictory to the wisdom of Gompers. There is danger to America and to the unions as a group in this deviation from past policy. The C. I. O. P. A. C. program is a pressure group attempting to force its will upon the people of the Nation It is seeking special privilege just as surely as did the money interests of the nineties. When Sidney Hillman told a congressional committee that P. A. C. is nonpartisan, he knew that the statement was untrue, because he himself had caused the rejection of one candidate for the Vice Presidency in the Democratic Convention and had been an active behind-the-scenes wirepuller in that convention.

These are problems which labor will find itself facing in the years to come. There is a conflict within labor organizations more vigorous than any conflict between labor and management. Radical left-wingers want to get their foot into the door of management; they want to make unionism a political as well as an economic and social movement; they want to set up class barriers.

In the early stages of the development of any labor organization such as the C. I. O. it is the radicals who are most vociferous who frequently gain control. But real, lasting progress seldom comes from these front runners. Union labor is as American as the flag, and in the ultimate evolution its organizations will find firm footing on the solid foundations in which are deeply rooted the philosophies of our people.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT THOMAS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the many friends of Hon. JOAQUIN MIGUEL ELIZALDE, Resident Commissioner of the Philippines from September 29, 1938, until his recent resignation, will miss him greatly.

Commissioner ELIZALDE's service in the Congress has been outstanding and distinguished. The Philippines was indeed fortunate in having a man of his good common sense, sound judgment, and broad business experience to represent its 17,000,000 people during these past hectic, unhappy, and trying 4 years.

All during the time the Japanese have occupied the Philippines, Commissioner ELIZALDE has been the leading spirit in bracing up the morale of his conquered and ill-treated people. He has a wealth of knowledge of economic, military, and social conditions, not only of our friends and allies, the Philippines and China, but also of the Japanese enemy and the countries Japan has overrun. That knowledge places him high on the list of men valuable and useful to our country. He has willingly shared his knowledge with Members of Congress and the departments of Government, to the great benefit of the war effort.

I, like the other Members, have learned to admire and respect "Mike," as he is affectionately known to his colleagues, as a man and a friend. All of us wish him well in whatever he undertakes.

Protect the United States First

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to say that I have been one of the Members of Congress who has consistently brought to the attention of the Congress the importance of giving some consideration to the protection and interests of the United States, and to the taxpayers who will have to pay the billions of dollars of our national debt in taxes.

Long before Senator BUTLER issued his statement about the vast amount of money that was being spent by the United States in other countries, I had inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a series of speeches entitled "Good Old Santa Claus," and today I read from yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a protest along the same lines by Senator BROOKS.

Mr. Speaker, self-preservation is the first law of nature, and it seems to me that we should give serious thought to the military safety of this country, for who can tell whether or not in 25 years we will not have to defend our own country again?

Instead of spending all of the money of the taxpayers of the United States to build airports, bases, and otherwise rehabilitate other countries of the world, it is high time that something be done in this respect for our own country.

I am in favor of securing all of the islands, all of the air bases, all of the naval bases, and any other installations which can and will protect us from aggression from any side, and I am again calling this matter to the attention of my colleagues in the Congress, as it is my opinion that this is a responsibility which rests squarely upon our shoulders, as well as upon the shoulders of our Army, Navy, Air Force, and other officials of our Government.

I am of the further opinion that we should preserve all of our war plants, and not destroy them, and perhaps have to rebuild them in future years.

I am glad to read in this morning's press a statement issued by Hon. Bradley Dewey, Rubber Director, wherein he stresses the necessity of keeping the low-cost rubber plants in operation.

Since I have in my district a large synthetic-rubber plant, and plants manufacturing allied and byproducts essential to the manufacture of this important commodity, I am heartily in accord with the statements made by Mr. Dewey, and with your permission I would like to include in my remarks the published articles by Senator BROOKS and by Mr. Dewey, as follows:

BROOKS DEMANDS UNITED STATES RIGHTS IN AIR BASE SALES

Senator BROOKS (Republican, Illinois) protested in the Senate yesterday against the recent sale of air bases in Canada and called upon Congress to prohibit further sales of American-built aviation facilities in other lands until American rights to their use have been guaranteed by treaties.

Asserting it is doubtful whether there is a single area where future air rights will be as necessary as those in Canada to the defense of the United States, BROOKS declared:

"Yet the War Department has already disposed of them by sale without first having our country enter into a treaty which will establish our right to future use of these air bases. * * * Already, before the war has been won, our War Department has sold all of these bases and flight strips at a price of almost $14,000,000 less than the cost to us."

In other countries throughout the world where air bases have been built, no provision has been made for their use by the United States, BROOKS said, "for any purpose," beyond 6 months after the close of war.

He said there was eloquent proof that the British Empire is moving with greater speed than we are in this all-important question.

KEEP SYNTHETIC-RUBBER PLANTS, BRADLEY DEWEY URGES

(By Christine Sadler)

A strong plea for the post-war operation of synthetic-rubber plants in this country was made yesterday by Bradley Dewey in the "appendix" to his final report as the Nation's rubber director.

Three major reasons for keeping the low-cost plants in operation were stressed as follows:

1. The post-war demand for rubber will be so great that an annual production of between 400,000 and 600,000 tons of synthetic will be needed, in addition to what the country could expect when it has access again to crude-rubber plantations of the Far East.

2. Specialty synthetics will be in demand due to qualities superior to crude rubber.

3. Buna S—the main general purpose synthetic—"will be in large demand at prices which will act as a governor and will set a ceiling on the world price of crude rubber."

Documenting his contention that synthetics can be produced at competitive prices, Dewey presented figures compiled by the Rubber Reserve Company to show that purchasers of natural rubber from July 1940, through June of this year have been made at an average cost of 25.6 cents per pound. This included purchases from Central and South America. Exclusive of supplies bought in the "other Americas," the cost per pound has averaged 21.4 cents.

The Rubber Reserve Company in the same period paid the following for American synthetics: Buna S. 35.2 cents per pound; neoprene, 26.7 cents; butyl, 35.6 cents; thiokol, 42 cents.

In its sales, the figures showed, the Company has been able to break even only on neoprene, which was sold for an average of 39.9 cents per pound—exclusive of Government purchases for war, and on natural rubber, not including that from Central and South America. The price received for the latter product averaged 24.9 cents per pound.

Numerous factors other than straight production costs should be considered before any synthetic plant is scrapped, Dewey urged. Among these were listed:

1. The public's stake in the plants, more than 95 percent of which have been built with Government funds totaling above $1,500,000,000.

2. The rapid deterioriation of plants not kept in at least stand-by condition and the rapid retrogression in chemical knowledge which would result should experiments and pilot production not be continued.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, under permission given by the House, I offer for the RECORD, the following item from last week's editorial columns of the Custer County (S. Dak.) Chronicle, embracing a poem by Badger Clark, poet laureate of South Dakota, written in 1940 and entitled "Acceptance":

[From the Custer County (S. Dak.) Chronicle of August 31, 1944]

OUR POET WAS A PROPHET

Four years ago the Chronicle published a poem by Badger Clark entitled "Acceptance." To refresh memories on the background of those times, we reprint certain remarks by Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

March 4, 1937: "My great ambition on January 20, 1941, is to turn over this desk and chair in the White House to my successor, whoever he may be, with the assurance that I am at the same time turning over to him as President a nation intact, a nation at peace, a nation prosperous. * * * A nation which has thus proved that the democratic form and methods of national government can and will succeed." (Speech at Democratic victory dinner.)

July 10, 1940: "When, in 1936, I was chosen by the voters for a second time as President, it was my firm intention to turn over the responsibilities of government to other hands at the end of my term. * * * Like most men of my age, I had made plans for myself, plans for a private life of my own choice and for my own satisfaction, a life of that kind to begin in January 1941. * * * In the face of public danger, my conscience will not let me turn my back upon a call to service." (Radio acceptance speech from the White House.)

And now we reprint the poem:

[From the Custer County (S. Dak.) Chronicle of October 24, 1940]

ACCEPTANCE—1940

My friends, my fellow Democrats,
Job holders, bosses, bureaucrats,
I see your fealty has not changed,
And things have gone through as arranged;
So I return with some elation,
Thanks for my third-term nomination.

This triumph draws the happy tears,
Yet I don't want it.
I've schemed to land it for two years,
But I don't want it.
I've praised the poor and cussed the rich,
I've tossed my old friends in the ditch,
I've got the Presidential itch,
Yet I don't want it.

Likewise my wife, dear girl, in tears,
Shrinks from the spotlight four more years,
And trembles at your call;
She writes and writes and talks and talks,
She drives and dances, flies and walks,
But how she hates it all!

We long to live in humble peace,
To terminate our White House lease.
Sweet peace! Oh, how we crave it!
Yet this wild Willkie must be braved
And our dear country must be saved,
And who but I can do it?

No; duty holds me on the rack;
And though I never may go back
To my dear little Hyde Park shack,
I'll stick to duty's rugged track.

Washington turned a third term down,
But he was only Washington.
Jefferson ducked the third-term crown,
But he was only Jefferson.
But you see,
I am me
And this is an emergency.
Emergency! How oft with me
That cry rings from the rafter!
I always shout emergency
To get what I am after.

Emergency. With tongue and pen
I dare and do not flee it,
Though those bone-headed Congressmen
Quite often cannot see it.

Emergency! It always ends
With my foes trounced severely,
With Federal jobs for all my friends
And votes for yours sincerely.
So, my friends, I'll bear once more
The burden for my country's sake,
Open again the Treasury door,
Give the poor bread while we have cake.

Once more, my friends, we'll prime the pump,
Once more beat down all hostile clans—
Hitler, that Indiana chump,
The Japs and the Republicans.

And when our joyous spending spree
Has blessed this land for four years more,
I'll dig up some emergency
To use in nineteen hundred and forty-four.
—Badger Clark.

And to bring the story down to date, we reprint certain recent utterances by Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

July 10, 1944: "For myself, I do not want to run. By next spring, I shall have been President and Commander in Chief of the armed forces for 12 years. * * * All that is within me cries out to go back to my home on the Hudson River, to avoid public responsibilities, and to avoid also the publicity which in our democracy follows every step of the Nation's Chief Executive." (Letter to Robert E. Hannegan, Democratic national chairman.)

July 20, 1944: "I accept the nomination. * * * It seems wholly likely that within the next 4 years our armed forces and those of our allies will have gained a complete victory over Germany and Japan sooner or later, and that the world once more will be at peace. * * * In any event, whenever that time comes, new hands will have full opportunity to realize the ideals which we seek." (Acceptance speech at west coast naval yard.)

Our poet was a prophet.

The Late Hon. George W. Norris

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to present for the wider perusal which will come through publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article which appeared in the September 5 issue of the Washington Post concerning the late Senator Norris and written by Capt. Richard L. Neuberger.

Senator Norris was loved and respected by the rank and file of Americans as few men have ever been. What is here written by able Captain Neuberger is a sensible and just appraisal of the character and the serene integrity of the late Senator from Nebraska. The article follows:

A COMMUNICATION

Throughout the Nation George W. Norris was a symbol of hope and progress to millions of men and women. In 1940 he spoke in my home State of Oregon and in the neighboring State of Washington. Farmers drove all night from hundreds of miles away to see and hear him. At Grand Coulee Dam they shook his hand with tears in their eyes. Some of them had been active in the progressive movement for five decades and shaking hands with Norris was the crowning event of their lives.

There were tears in the old Senator's eyes, too, as he looked down at the great dam, the largest power project on earth. "This is the fulfillment of my dream," he said, and I am sure he remembered those days when alone in Congress he fought for Government development of America's rivers.

Norris went back a long way, to the time of Bryan and T. R. and McKinley. I once heard Col. C. E. S. Wood, who fought in the Indian wars with Custer and Kit Carson, tell me that Norris had been "the standard bearer of liberalism's guidons for three generations of Americans."

Of all his deeds I think the old Senator was most proud of his vote in 1917 against American participation in the First World War. I remember sitting with him in the den of his little stucco house in McCook and hearing that tale—of how he had been sent German Iron Crosses in the mail and how he had gone back to Nebraska to report to his people.

He rented a hall at Lincoln and walked onto the platform all alone. No one would dare introduce him. He looked out over the silent throng, a white-haired old man in a neat black suit and shoestring tie. "I have come home to tell you the truth," he began. Somewhere near the back of the hall a man applauded. Another man took it up. The applause grew, then the crowd was on its feet. Cheering commenced. "In that moment," Norris told me, "I felt repaid for all the agony, for all the abuse, for all the vilification."

This event made a vivid impression on his mind. Yet that mind was never closed. He changed his mind about this war and was an early advocate of American intervention. He supported the President's foreign policy on through from the fall of France.

The Tennessee Valley Authority is Norris' monument. He began advocating the T. V. A. in 1923 when he opposed the sale of Muscle Shoals to Henry Ford. The elder La Follette stood at his side for a few years. When La Follette died Norris said of him, "He was the leader of the advancing column of hope and progress." La Follette never saw the T. V. A. built. Norris Dam on the Clinch River is now one of the T. V. A.'s key units, although the old man declined to attend the dedication of a bust of himself at the site of the project.

People in every State wrote to Norris about injustices and wrongs. They felt that in him they had a ready champion. Oregon, where I live, is 1,700 miles from Nebraska, yet men and women on Oregon's farms looked to Norris for help and assistance. To the end of his career he maintained an interest in the family of the late Senator Lane, of Oregon, who was one of the four in the Senate who stood with Norris and the elder La Follette against war in 1917.

Norris was no breast-beater making loud noises. Neither did he view the functioning of democracy from Olympian heights, as do some liberals. He believed that democracy was part of one's daily life. He was considerate to those who worked for him. He shunned display and protocol. He had no chauffeur. He and his wife often stopped at tourist homes and boarding houses on their way between Nebraska and Washington.

Norris disliked slickness. Innuendo and double meaning were not in his arsenal. He trusted people who were open-handed and outspoken. He asked simple, direct questions. A number of administration supporters did not want the late J. D. Ross to be the first Director of the Bonneville Power Authority. "J. D." wore high shoes, suspenders, and big hats. "'J. D.' is right down the line for public power, isn't he?" asked Norris. The President appointed "J. D."

The last time I saw Norris was in the summer of 1942, shortly before I went to Alaska with the United States Army Engineers. I spent the afternoon in his office with him and Irving Dilliard, of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, who is now also in the Army.

The Senator talked of his past. He relived the days when he overthrew "Uncle Joe" Cannon. He spoke of T. V. A. and Bonneville and Coulee and what they could do for the Nation. He stood again with "the little group of willful men." He said this would have to be the last war or we all were finished. He tired as the shadows of late afternoon lined the park outside.

Dilliard and I got up to leave. "Good-bye, Irving," Norris said. "Good-bye, Dick. You boys and the rest all over the country will have to carry on. I am at the end of the trail. My part in the struggle is over."

R. L. NEUBERGER.

WASHINGTON, September 3.

Farley Steps Down

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW J. MERRITT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Troy (N. Y.) Observer-Budget of June 11, 1944, titled "Farley Steps Down":

FARLEY STEPS DOWN

The news that Jim Farley no longer heads the Democratic State committee seems almost incredible. Since 1928, when he was elected secretary of that body, he has been the helmsman and never let go of the tiller at any time, even after he went on to the national chairmanship and the office of Postmaster General. Mr. Farley was the most dynamic and energetic individual to head the Democratic Party in this State and infused life into a political organization whose activities for many years had been merely perfunctory. The strategy of the Democratic command before Big Jim came into the picture had been to pile up a big vote in Greater New York through the popularity of Al Smith and then ride along on his coat tails. Upstate New York was a neglected country.

Not so with Farley. Under his leadership the chairman of every county committee began to feel that he and his organization really amounted to something and the personal letters signed in the famous green ink which were sent to him from the fourth floor of the Biltmore Hotel inspired him to do his damnedest for Jim and the party candidate. The results were amazing for many years, until the party schism occurred in 1942 and the legendary Mr. Dewey entered the State political picture.

We do not profess to know what Mr. Farley's future political plans are. We assume that he intends to bring his ideas of democracy before the national convention in Chicago. If he does, we think that he will perform a valuable service to his party and to the Republic. It has been apparent for several years that there is more than one school of thought in the Democratic Party. An open discussion of these differences of opinion in the forum of the national convention could by no means be construed as disloyalty to the Commander in Chief in time of war.

It would, we think, be convincing evidence to the world that we practice at home what we preach to the world—democracy.

Post-War Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speeker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address entitled "Post-war Problems," delivered by me before the Rotary and Kiwanis Clubs, Richmond, Va., September 5, 1944:

Mr. Chairman, members of the Rotary and Kiwanis Clubs and guests, the war has brought many changes—changes in our industrial, social, and economic lives. We now face the problem of reappraising our way of life and readjusting our economy to meet these new conditions. America has new responsibilities to itself and to the world. Aside from the prime purpose of joining hands with the other peace-loving nations in an effort to build, by collaboration and cooperation, a world where there will be peace and tranquillity, we face a problem on the home front of equal proportions. Our war-inflated industrial capacity cannot be allowed to drop back to pre-war levels without causing a domestic crisis we dare not permit. This is our No. 1 domestic problem. According to whether or not we are able to solve this will depend, to a very large extent, our domestic happiness and peace. The rapidly approaching end of the European phase of this war poses a number of problems of great magnitude. Congress has scught to meet these problems, insofar as they can be met by legislative action at this stage of developments.

Keenly sensible of our duty to the fighting men and women and their dependents, we have passed legislation and set up the machinery which I think will generously care for them. This is what I am sure the majority of the American people wish to have done.

We have passed in the House of Representatives, legislation dealing with contract termination, surplus property disposal, and reconversion. These latter two important pieces of legislation are now being worked out by joint committees of the House of Representatives and United States Senate. It is reasonable to suppose that they will fairly well meet this problem until experience has shown us where, if at all, we should make changes.

I have mentioned our war-inflated industries. When some time before Pearl Harbor it became perfectly apparent that the war was world-wide in scope, and that it would in all probability spread all over Europe and Asia and even to the Western Hemisphere if not checked, the President of the United States set about to mobilize American thought and action in an effort to put into the hands of the powers who were resisting Axis aggression equipment of war and supplies necessary to enable them to carry on the fight. He appeared before a joint session of Congress and made his "Arsenal of Democracy" speech. The objectives which he set seemed at the time fantastic. About that time there was called up in Washington a conference which was attended by leading industrial analysts, statisticians, and production experts. This conference was attended by gentlemen of all types and philosophies. There were present the ultra-conservative, as well as the so-called starry-eyed boys. The question posed was what could American industry do in the way of supplying for our expanding forces and for the United Nations implements and supplies of war. The more conservative, and by far the greater percentage, estimated that by a great united effort we might produce in war material and supplies in the neighborhood of twenty or twenty-five billion dollars in the first year. The extremely optimistic put it as high as $40,000,000,000. Now let us see what America really did when we got together and decided on a course of action. We produced more than twice the amount estimated by the most optimistic experts—namely, more than $100,000,000,000 worth of war materials in the first year. The increased production of food was equally impressive. What has been accomplished by this united effort of the American people will, I am sure, go down as one of the industrial and agricultural miracles of the age. That is not an overstatement or an exaggeration, and this was accomplished in spite of handicaps and difficulties. We raised an Army, Navy, Air Forces, and Marine Corps.

We equipped them and transported many of them to foreign bases. We supplied and sent equipment to the United Nations. We built planes, tanks, ammunition, motor vehicles, all manner of supplies, clothing, medical supplies, and foods in ever increasing quantities. Since the beginning of the European war, we built 65,000 ships for the Navy and a vast merchant marine. Transportation systems within the United States went into high gear and the railroads have performed one of the most remarkable accomplishments in the history of rail transportation. All of this spells out the present high road to victory which we are traveling. It makes us realize the unlimited power of this Nation and her people when united they set out upon a course of action. These phenomenal results could only have come about in one way and that was by the united action of the American people. I do not overlook the fact that there have been rough spots in this picture—some very ugly spots. There have been instances where segments of labor have been under bad leadership. There have been instances where some categories of industry were very slow to get into step and were very loath to overlook the opportunity for war profits and advantages. There were some instances where the public generally were most impatient, apathetic, and noncooperative, in falling in line with a Nation geared up to total war—but in the sum total of things, these were isolated instances and, percentagewise, of little consequence. When one steps back from the whole picture and gets a sweeping panoramic view of America mobilizing for war, it is an inspiring picture. It is a tribute to industry, labor, and agriculture and to the American people. This war has been splendidly organized.

Yesterday was Labor Day. What is labor? It is the rank and file of the productive workers of the country—the men and women who make things, who keep the wheels of industry turning. They may work in office, shop, or factory, in the fields or on the sea. It does not matter where they work, whether it be in teeming city, or on a lonely hillside farm, whether the sound in their ears is that of whirring machinery or the slap of waves against a small fishing boat. So long as they produce or help in production proves that they are labor. There are literally millions of these laborers in America. It is appropriate and fitting, right at this point, that I make an observation or two on that subject.

The history of the labor movement in America is one of absorbing interest. Because of a diversity of interests, sometimes because of sectional differences, and sometimes because of unfortunate leadership, the going has not always been smooth. When one surveys the whole picture, I am sure that this movement has had a most notable effect in improving the lot of the workers of America. I think that there are a few outstanding facts that are self-evident. The first is that working conditions are more favorable, and standards of living higher in America today than in any other land. Second, there is less friction and a more cooperative spirit between the employer and the employee than in any other country. Like any other great movement, labor has had its trials and difficulties. At times it has been a house divided against itself. It has also had to fight to rid itself of subversive elements that sought to gain control in some of its branches.

Today, 62 years after that first Labor Day, we find much progress has been made in the lot of the man who toils. Great social and economic reforms have come. They have been universally accepted in principle. Among them can be mentioned: Social security, old-age pensions, unemployment compensation, railroad retirement, employer liability, the right to bargain collectively, and the principle of minimum pay and maximum hours, and many other protective measures, as well as measures for the protection of women and children in industry.

MEN MUST WORK

The world does not owe a man a living, but just as surely as the principles of right are essential to civilization, the world does owe a man a chance to make a living. Under our system of government, we undertake to guarantee to our fellow citizen an opportunity to support himself and his dependents by honest toil.

May I quote to you a few paragraphs from an address that I made on the floor of the House of Representatives on May 16, 1940. We had under consideration an appropriation for unemployment relief. Here is what I said:

"May we indulge for a moment in a little homespun philosophy? In my judgment, one of the factors that have made America a great nation, a nation of which we are proud and that we like to boast about, is the individuality of its citizens, the individuality of their opportunity, the individuality of their responsibility. We are told that under our system of government, there are certain great guaranties, one of the greatest of which is the guaranty of equality of opportunity.

"The opportunity of an American citizen, that our system of government guarantees is the opportunity to work, to live, to support his dependents, to start at the bottom and climb to the top, to establish himself, to own his own home, to acquire and own property, to educate his children, to support his churches, and to hold his head up as the peer of every freeman who lives on the face of the earth.

"Not only that, but he has a responsibility as a citizen, a responsibility to help support this Government under which he lives. He must obey its laws and institutions. He should subscribe to its philosophies and glory in its traditions.

"Bear in mind that this guaranty of equality is not a complete guaranty of property equality. It does not mean that if one man, by brain or brawn, succeeds in accumulating a few dollars some other less industrious or fortunate citizen has a right, by one way or another, to take half of that and divide it up, because of the guaranty of equality of the Constitution. That is not so. That is not the guaranty at all. The guaranty under the Constitution is that under this great scheme of life it will be a fair, equal, open competition on the part of every citizen to work and to live and to acquire property and enjoy the good things of life—the great competitive scheme of America, where 'the race is to the swiftest' and the 'battle to the strong.' Such is the fundamental philosophy upon which our Government was founded, and it is upon that philosophy that it has grown to be the greatest government on the face of the earth."

I have commented upon our great accomplishment in mobilizing for war production. Paradoxical as it may seem, of perhaps of greater importance and beset with many difficulties will be the tasks of liquidation—the liquidation of war production, including, as it does, the cancelation of war contracts and the disposing of Government-owned war plants and surpluses. This is a problem that is right on our doorstep. It will not be met by merely trying to return to a pre-war level of production. That would be an easy goal to attain. We are told, however, that our production in the post-war period, in order to prevent a great crisis, must be 40 or 50 percent greater than that of 1940. This will call for speed in solving the problems of transition and for removing, wherever possible, unnecessary Government interferences and controls. This problem will tax American ingenuity. To shift to a post-war scale of business activity in which there is expanded production and new employment opportunities in private industry will be our problem. The success of the transition will depend upon the unity of the people and upon the readiness of private business, agriculture, and labor to subordinate their personal desires for temporary advantages to the greater advantage of restoring the national economy to a healthy and durable prosperity.

I have stated that this was a big job. We are told that we have now outstanding between eighty and one hundred billion dollars of uncompleted war contracts. These are placed out in between one hundred to two hundred and fifty thousand prime contracts. These contracts will have to be cancelled and adjustments made with the contractors. We have provided suitable legislation for this.

It has been estimated that the surplus war matériel, including contractor inventories, will be some sixty to seventy-five billion dollars. Of this at least three-fourths will be in combat ordnance. Approximately fifteen or twenty billions will be in merchantable goods. The problem of protecting the Government's interests and protecting industry and labor by not flooding the markets with these goods is another problem. We are moving in on that and have called upon the leading production and sales experts in the Nation.

The Government has expended in the present emergency probably $33,000,000,000 in the construction of plants and other facilities. Approximately half of this is on military installations—the other half is the Government's investment in industrial plants. Here, again, the business ability and the genius of American industry and labor will be called upon to cooperate. Being an optimist, however, I believe we can and will lick these problems. The best contribution that the Government can make, or at least a notable contribution, will be to cooperate with industry to see that it gets geared up to peacetime production and that it has expanded markets for its products. On this will depend whether or not we will be able to give jobs to returning soldiers and to our laid-off war workers.

I am convinced that industry and labor, as well as the public, realizing the importance of this task and what it means to our domestic peace, will give to these pressing problems on the home front the same unfailing and patriotic service which has been given to the war effort.

Something for Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Pittsburgh Press of September 4, 1944:

SOMETHING FOR CONGRESS

It seems to be a set part of our political make-up that—

1. We sit back in the primaries, when the bosses are picking party candidates, and pay little attention.

2. We direct all of our attention in the general elections to the head of the ticket and do a hit-and-miss on the tail end. And a lot of us don't vote at all.

3. This we follow up by loud and persistent beefs about the people in government.

All the while we are expecting to get brilliant-minded, simon-pure, nonpolitical politicians in public office. And we have been very careful not to overpay them.

This attitude we particularly impose on Congress, until sometimes it is a wonder we get anybody to run for Congress. And it's no wonder we so many times don't get the right men.

Here in Pennsylvania we pay our judges good salaries—$14,000 for common pleas judges in Allegheny County, $18,000 for superior court judges, $19,500 for supreme court judges. And the lower court judges need run for office only once in 10 years and the supreme court term runs 21 years.

We even pay our Governor a fair salary—$18,000.

But Congressmen, from Pennsylvania and every other State, get only $10,000 a year. And no perquisites to speak of.

On this salary they must live in the most expensive town in America—Washington. They must make frequent trips back home to see constituents. They must run for office every 2 years, which means they practically are campaigning the whole time. They must maintain a home in their district and another in Washington. And they are No. 1 victims on every sucker list.

Some have suggested that a Congressman's pay be raised to $20,000 or $25,000 a year.

What figure is the correct amount, we are not attempting to judge.

But it is a fact that few Congressmen, especially in these days of high prices, can make both ends meet on their salary—especially if they keep up their fences at home. This is one reason so many able men, without independent financial resources, decline to run for Congress. They can't afford it. Particularly in the last 10 years or so since being a Congressman has become a full-time job.

The public is forever asking Congress to do something for us.

It's about time somebody did something for Congress.

Not in the Blood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, it is refreshing to note that not only the military authorities but people in civil life are paying justly deserved tribute to our citizens of Japanese ancestry who have served and are serving so faithfully, and in notable instances so heroically, on foreign battlefields. The following editorial from the New York Times of September 2 is well worth reading:

NOT IN THE BLOOD

Their names are Masaki Fujikawa, Shinei Nakamine, Denis Masato Hashimoto, Grover Kazutomi Nagaji, Kenji Kato, Tsugiyasu Toma, all killed in action against their country's enemy. Irving M. Akahosi was cited for his conduct during a daring mission at Anzio. Frank Morihara, Arthur Shinyama, and James Iwamoto all wear the Purple Heart for honorable wounds received in the Italian campaign. Thomas Higa has or will have the same decoration. He was wounded at Cassino. Other Americans of Japanese descent have fought for our flag in the Pacific and in Burma, taking risks, because of their race, over and beyond those assumed by white soldiers. Their comrades of the Thirty-fourth Infantry Division in Italy and of units to which they have been attached in other areas have accepted them wholeheartedly. Letters from other American soldiers received in this office have proclaimed the loyalty and devotion of these men.

What this proves is a fact encouraging for Japanese-Americans, for the country of which they are citizens and for the long prospect ahead. There is nothing in the Japanese blood, or in any racial blood, that makes men ignorant and brutal. Education and environment turn the scales one way or the other. A whole generation in Japan and Germany has gone to waste and worse than waste. Under decent governments, in a decent society, in a decently organized world, the coming generations may be reclaimed. The war must be won by destruction, but the peace will be kept only by education.

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler Supports F. D. R.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT RAMSPECK
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Ralph Smith from the Atlanta Journal of September 3, 1944:

CRACKERLAND IN WASHINGTON

(By Ralph Smith)

DR. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER SUPPORTS F. D. R.

WASHINGTON, September 2.—Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, of New York, the Republican nominee for Vice President on the ticket with President William H. Taft in 1912, is supporting President Roosevelt for a fourth term. So, too, is Mrs. Butler actively for the Democratic Presidential ticket.

The report reaching Washington from the Southampton, Long Island, summer residence of the Butlers, has fallen among Republicans on Capitol Hill like a devastating demolition bomb. It is interpreted as unmistakable evidence that prominent and representative Republicans are unimpressed with Gov. Thomas E. Dewey's indefinite and wishy-washy position with respect to foreign affairs and international issues.

Dr. Butler is an outstanding American. He has been president of Columbia University since 1901, has attended nine Republican National Conventions since 1888, as a delegate from the State of New York, and received the support of the New York delegation for the Presidential nomination in 1920, after having previously been selected as President Taft's running mate in 1912.

A trustee of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching since 1905, Dr. Butler has been a trustee of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace since 1925 and is at present chairman of the Carnegie Corporation. He is a director of the New York Life Insurance Co., a trustee of St. John the Divine Cathedral, a former chairman of the American Red Cross (1914–24), and was awarded the Nobel peace prize in 1931.

There has been no statement or explanation of Dr. Butler's desertion of Governor Dewey in the present campaign, yet the impression persists that the far-seeing and studious educator and statesman is mindful of the fact that Dewey is following in the footsteps of Harding with respect to world peace and international amity.

None of the old-timers here in Washington—not even Republican stalwart Senators who are now planning a campaign against "entangling post-war alliances"—has forgotten Harding's pious pose on his front porch in 1920, protesting his support of a society or organization of nations to preserve the peace of the world:

"There are distinctly two types of international relationship. One is the offensive and defensive alliance of great powers. The other type is a society of free nations or an association of free nations or a league of free nations animated by consideration of right and justice instead of might and self-interest, and not merely proclaimed an agency in pursuit of peace but so organized and so participated in as to make the actual attainment of peace a reasonable possibility.

"Such an association I favor with all my heart, and I would make no fine distinction as to whom credit is due. One need not care what it is called. Let it be an association, a society, or a league, or what not. Our concern is solely with the substance, not the form thereof."

It was this assurance of Warren G. Harding that moved Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler and 30 other distinguished Republicans to aline themselves behind the Republican nominee of 1920. The joint statement which they issued said:

"The Republican Party is bound by every consideration of good faith to pursue such a course until the object is obtained. We therefore believe we can most effectively advance the cause of international cooperation to promote peace by supporting Mr. Harding for the Presidency."

Joining in this pledge with Dr. Butler were Lyman Abbott, Robert Brookings, John Grier Hibben, Herbert Hoover, Charles Evans Hughes, A. Lawrence Lowell, Elihu Root, Henry L. Stimson, Oscar Straus, Henry W. Taft, William Allen White, George W. Wickersham, Lyman B. Wilbur, and others.

Of course, Dr. Butler is familiar with what happened following the election of Harding. The pious promise given by the Republican nominee on his front porch at Marion, Ohio, was abandoned. The Old Guard felt then, as Governor Dewey felt in Wisconsin when he pledged that "we shall keep completely out of the affairs of Europe."

Forewarned is forearmed. Dr. Butler, America's most distinguished educator and statesman, although a lifelong Republican, is not supporting Governor Dewey, the titular leader of the party with which he has affiliated actively for over half a century.

Freedom and Union—Editorial From the Allegheny Valley Advance-Leader

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, victory is within our grasp, yes; but we must not forget that America is paying the supreme price for victory—the flower of our manhood. Our sole objective is to bring a just and enduring peace to the world. We must avoid the catastrophe that befell this Nation following World War No. 1. We must educate our people to avoid the pitfalls of isolationism. We must reinculcate the spirit of religion into the hearts and souls of all Americans. We must preach and practice tolerance in order that we may live in a better post-war world of tomorrow. It is for us the living to establish democracy—the democracy for which our gallant sons gave their lives.

That burden is in a great part the task of our grass-root newspapers of this Nation. Newspapers like the ones back in our home towns—the Glassport Times, Clairton Progress, Braddock Free Press, the Turtle Creek Independent, Homestead Messenger, the Allegheny Valley Advance-Leader—the kind of newspapers that we find throughout the country. These newspapers have a great responsibility to educate the public through a strong, clear, nonpartisan editorial policy. Len C. Anderson, outstanding young American country editor of the Allegheny Valley Advance-Leader, has set a good example in advocating the spirit of religion, tolerance, and good will so vitally necessary in molding public opinion through his editorial of September 1, 1944, which I am pleased to include herein as part of my remarks. Let the larger newspapers follow his excellent pattern. In this crucial hour, this Nation needs more editors like Len C. Anderson; we need more grass-root newspapers like his Allegheny Valley Advance-Leader.

ADVANCIN'

(With L. C. Anderson, in which a country editor tell how the world is being run and how it should be run.)

FREEDOM AND UNION

America remains a strong nation of free men only so long as America remains a nation of united men. Our enemies know this—know that they cannot conquer us while we are united—know that before they can subdue us they must divide us. It becomes plain and inescapably true, therefore, that the patriotic duty of every loyal American is to resist and overcome attempts of Axis propagandists, and their satellites in this country, to destroy our freedom by destroying the union upon which it depends. Our enemies seek to divide us by pitting Protestants against Catholics, Gentiles against Jews, native-born against foreign-born.

But above all else, we can never forget that just as it has taken men of many races and creeds to make America, it is now taking men of many races and creeds to preserve America during this war. Our heroes and defenders are not men of one race. They are men of many races—but all Americans. Remember that.

Remember Frank O'Brien, of Sugar Grove, Ill. He was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross for his heroic conduct in rescuing an Air Corps officer marooned in the waters of Turnagian Arm, Alaska.

Remember Meyer Levin, of Brooklyn, N. Y. He was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross. As Colin Kelly's bombardier he sank the Japanese battleship Haruna, and received a second citation for action in the Coral Sea.

Remember Harry Torgerson, of Lynbrook, Long Island. This marine is credited with having blasted 50 Japanese emplacements and machine-gun nests with TNT in the conquest of Henderson Field.

Remember Dorie Miller, of Waco, Tex. He was cited by the Navy Department for distinguished devotion to duty, extraordinary courage, and disregard of personal safety in face of enemy strafing during attack on the fleet in Pearl Harbor.

Remember George Schaetzel, of Denver, Colo. He was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross for his courageous and skillful participation in bombing raids on Japanese shipping in the Indies waters.

Remember Theodore Boselli, of New York City. He was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross and Oak Leaf Cluster. He has flown more than 125,000 miles over the South Pacific, and safely carried nearly every British and United States general stationed in the Far East.

Remember these men—different in racial origin—different in religious persuasion—but free and united as Americans for the advancement of the great American ideals of freedom, equality, and union.

The Soldiers Did Vote and Will Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER C. PLOESER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, for months there has been a constant flow of propaganda about soldiers voting.

In Missouri our soldiers have voted successfully. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. Every Missouri soldier who wished a ballot in the past primary election obtained one and voted legally. The same will hold true in the general election. This proves that the many statements claiming that the soldiers were being deprived of their vote are false.

On February 11, 1944, I made a speech on this subject, which was extended into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 15. My purpose is to again call it to the attention of the people and the Members of this House. I think it timely to read again:

THE SOLDIERS' VOTE FRAUD

NEED FOR SIMPLE HONESTY

On the eve of the birthday anniversary of the immortal Abraham Lincoln, we Americans approach a crisis in our history. To hope for another Lincoln may be one way to indulge in forgetfulness of the many lessons of this wondrous, though simple, American life. Abraham Lincoln understood the application of simple honesty and plain common sense. America, today, needs the courage to apply common sense to the test of leaders and to demand ordinary integrity as the fundamental motive in the acts of our leaders.

AMERICAN CRISIS

The American crisis today is twofold—military and civil. It intensifies as we approach election day in November of this year. This very critical time in our history is made all the more crucial because of the selfish and avaricious ambition of a group of would-be monarchists operating in our Federal Government. These people have as their symbol and as their head Franklin Delano Roosevelt in the Presidency of the United States. They are more concerned in his perpetuity of power than they are in any degree of America's future. They leave no stones unturned—no paths untrod—in their revolution to destroy freedom in America and to set up in its place a post-war monarchy. To them America is not a democratic nation of 135,000,000 people, or a nation of 48 sovereign States. To them the strength of our Government is not derived from the practiced ability of the people's right to govern themselves successfully. They are the enemies of local self-government. They are the enemies of the sovereignty of the several States. They are guided by the principle that the power of the State stems from the control of the State by the few—instead of the traditional American premise, which has clearly demonstrated that the power and strength of the State should stem from the people. To them America is a mass of robots, divided into controllable or uncontrollable classes, or a mass of voting puppets, divided into controllable or uncontrollable groups of votes. They never think of the voters as individual Americans thinking for themselves and constantly striving to provide good government. They think of the voters of the Nation only as stepping stones to satisfy their greater appetite for individual power.

VOTE FRAUD ATTEMPT

This monarchistic group is known as the New Deal. They are a cancer within a great political party known as the Democratic Party. They have become a cancer within the democracy. They have rotted the very foundation of our Nation by defiance of the peoples' representative government and by repeated attacks upon the peoples' Constitution. They have been guilty of stealing elections—of buying elections—and now have added to their many other crimes a desperate attempt to manipulate an entire Federal election by vitiating constitutional provisions. This attempt is known as the Green-Lucas Federal ballot for the members of the armed forces. They have raised a great issue which may well decide the fate of the Nation. The issue is this: Shall the members of the armed forces be regimented and crowded into the voting of a blank, nameless ballot, on the crest of a wave of biased, partisan New Deal propaganda—or shall the members of the armed services be permitted in the same fashion as every other citizen to vote under a program, which would take to them as individual citizens their regular constitutional ballot? In order to foist this issue on the public, the New Deal has marshaled all of their propaganda forces of the Nation. These forces are dedicated to the eventual overthrow of the Republic. With these forces have been enlisted many loyal innocents who, in good faith and with every sincere intention, have trusted the people in high positions in the Federal Government to be incapable of fraud. These leaders of the New Deal are not only capable of fraud, but have a record of fraudulent conventions and elections.

PRESIDENT ASHAMED OF NEW DEAL

After the return of the President from the Teheran Conference, the New Deal managers started in dead earnest to work on the fourth-term drive. The first public move was a carefully timed political feint on the part of the President. This cute maneuver was made during a press conference when the President related the allegory concerning Dr. New Deal and Dr. Win-the-War. The President said that the New Deal was dead. With the existence of a Congress as strong as the present one—or one even stronger (such as most Americans anticipate next year) the New Deal is dead. While the New Deal totters around the edge of the grave, it will never be considered safely dead as long as new dealers live in places of political power. But, the public is genuinely sick and tired of the New Deal and its repeated failures. The net result of the New Deal, after these past 11 years, has been a back-breaking mortgage on the future.

PEOPLE WANT CHANGE

Elections of 1940 and of 1942 and of 1943, and special elections, have been ample evidence to the White House managers that the people have caught up with them. Accordingly, the first political move must be a feint to make the people believe that these New Deal theorists have given up—that the administration is moving over to the path of sanity. Nothing is further from the truth.

NEW DEAL POLITICAL DESPERATION

After this first move it became necessary to make a positive gesture which would win back certain blocs of votes. The largest bloc of votes today is the members of the armed services—more than 10,000,000. These servicemen had largely lost confidence in the management of the home front because of the reported strikes and general confusion in domestic management. The administration had been guilty of mothering these strikes and smiling upon their continuance. The administration had been guilty of yielding in its own rules which is designed to "hold the line" in the fight against inflation. The administration had been guilty of following a line of no labor policy which was the cause of labor strikes, labor shortages, and labor unrest and distrust. Despite censorship control these items of news had reached the troops who resent the situation. For years the administration had played labor along for the votes they could get by so doing. Now, some of their bad children had come home to plague them. This situation was divorcing them from the soldier vote and from the mass of voters here at home. Their mismanagement of labor was splitting their labor-vote ranks. The labor leaders, who were stooges for the administration, were having trouble holding their thinking members in bondage. Well-managed unions were discouraged by Presidential preferences.

ADVOCATED POLITICAL SLAVE LABOR

In January, at the opening of the second session of the Seventy-eighth Congress, the Presidential message called for a national service act or a draft of all the people. It, of course, did not mention constant Presidential opposition to all sincere attempts on the part of the Congress to stop strikes. This move was designed to soften any opposition growing in the votes of the armed forces.

DR. JEKYLL AND MR. HYDE

The next move was to follow up on February 1 with one of the most dishonest of all state papers—the Presidential message on the soldiers' vote issue. In this message the President represented himself as sort of a Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. He used his Presidential privilege to send a direct White House message to the Congress to represent himself as a private citizen making an appeal. He used the same privilege to assume the role of a lobbyist for civil rights because he is the Commander in Chief of the armed services. With all of these self-assumed titles he proceeded to indulge in the greatest of American falsehoods by accusing the Congress of the United States of perpetrating a fraud against the men and women in the military services. He accused the Congress of attempting to keep the men from voting. American history does not record any occupant of the White House committing such a desperate political move. This message constitutes a new low in national politics.

TRUTH NOT TOLD

The President failed to tell the people and the armed services that his own vote plan was an unconstitutional move to regiment their votes and count them with a New Deal board of five. He failed to state that this move was a conspiracy to usurp the constitutional rights of the States. He failed to tell them that the ballot they were to vote was not a legal ballot but, instead, a blank and a dud. He failed to tell them that under his plan their votes would probably be illegal and uncounted. He failed to tell them that they would not be able to vote the Federal ballot for their State and local officers. He failed to tell them that this was a purely political move to destroy the sovereignty of the States—26 of which are Republican, and a political menace to his fourth-term desires. All of these things he failed to tell them. Instead, he posed a monstrous political hypocrisy. His message got through to the troops. Opposition messages by the majority of the Congress will find little chance of filtering through the lines of censorship.

STAND UP AND BE COUNTED

He demanded that the Congress stand up and be counted. He tried to distort the rules of the House. Throughout the land New Deal mouthpieces howled his partisan propaganda. These voices, heard on the radio and in the stultified press, are behaving like so many stooges. The program was so crude that the great Democratic Party, which enjoys the control of the Congress, split wide open on the issue. Staunch and true Democrats refused to go along with a plot which was designed to reelect them by unconstitutional means. Added to this has been weeks of New Deal congressional filibuster. These are days which demand strong hearts and great moral courage to face the attacks designed to destroy the Republic. Thank God such men are to be found in both political parties in the Congress.

KNOW ALL—KNOW NOTHING?

In Missouri we had the spectacle of having the servile New Deal press acting the usual role of a Charlie McCarthy. In St. Louis the New Deal Star-Times was found in the embarrassing position of having mimicked weasel words on Wednesday, February 2, only to have to swallow their political Adam's apple on Friday, February 4.

THE SERVILE CLIQUE

Stand up and be counted was the false howl. Well, the House of Representatives at the proper time, and without consulting the New Deal, stood up and was counted. I am proud to say the eight Republican Members of Missouri stood firm for the preservation of the American Constitution. Now let the proponents of this election plot stand up and be counted. Let them tell the truth to the men in the Army and Navy. I'll enumerate a few of these proponents for you. They were and are: New Deal political managers; Members of the Congress, who go along with whatever the White House whip demands; Communist organizations; Communist-front organizations; C. I. O. Political Action Committee, headed by White House stooge Hillman, and organized to promote a fourth term; New Deal subsidized columnists; New Deal subsidized radio commentators; New Deal-controlled newspapers, such as the "pink" New York PM; the Chicago Sun; the Daily Worker, a Communist journal; New Masses, a Communist journal; the "stoogey" St. Louis Star-Times, and others who were pathetically misled despite their sincerity. Among the sincere were those in all groups who fail to understand that the roots of democracy are grown in the soil of local self-government. These good people fail to understand that the strength of our Republic stems from the people, their counties, and States, and not from the Federal Government.

Any public administration which spends more time finding ways of keeping its perpetual power than it spends in doing good for the future of the Nation bodes ill and bad weather for the future of the Nation.

A BRIGHT DAY AHEAD

Next election day can be the blackest in the history of the Nation or the brightest in many a future day to come. Because of such dangerous attacks against the Republic, we are a people half determined, half confused. We are determined that we shall have a change on the muddled home front. We are confused in the question of changing the Commander in Chief. We people must realize that any change for the better is always a good change to make. Any opportunity to obtain sound Executive leadership will be an enormous improvement over the bungling political Executive leadership of today. Any patriotic leadership will retain our good military leadership of today without interference. Any patriotic leadership with competent executive qualities will lend aid to the military which will be of tremendous new aid to the battle fronts. If we have faith in the future of our Republic—if we want a future for our Republic—we will have the simple and plain courage to make this change for improvement in the constitutional manner this year. To ignore the impulse of this simple courage is to yield our Government to a one-man rule. Revival of the New Deal spells American monarchy. I fear the Republic cannot withstand another 4 years of the present New Deal administration. Failure on our part to carry this message to our troops abroad or to our fellow citizens at home will allow a betrayal of our fighting forces. The accursed forces which propagate destructive propaganda here at home and abroad are America's greatest enemies of tomorrow—they are enemies of the boys who fight—the enemies of their children and ours.

MONSTROUS INCONGRUITY

How could anyone believe such a monstrous incongruity as to believe that the same Washington managers could manage so badly at home and yet do so well on the battlefronts? The plain truth is that military successes come from a different management, not the President. The division of that management came back in the middle of 1942 as history will some day reveal. Since then we have gone forward militarily, while domestically we have bungled our present and undermined our future.

Army Order Resented

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMIE L. WHITTEN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Memphis Commercial Appeal of September 1, 1944:

ARMY ORDER RESENTED

(From the Montgomery Advertiser)

Montgomery, a tolerant, liberal, and intensely patriotic city, is profoundly disturbed by reports of high Army efforts to impose race customs and habits on the local military reservations that are in conflict with relationships growing out of generations of experience.

Montgomery quickly, firmly, and advisedly wants to let it be known that any effort designed, directly or indirectly, to impose any form of social equality, is something that neither this community nor any other southern community can tolerate. This represents the thought of the better elements of both white and colored races on the subject.

If it be said that Army orders are something from which there is no recourse, the people of this community would have it understood that even Army orders, even armies, even bayonets, cannot force impossible and unnatural social race relationships upon us. It has been tried before and failed. It will fail if tried again.

Orders from Army headquarters seeking at this late date in the war to make whites and blacks mingle on a basis of social equality at the restaurant tables on the military posts or camps of this State can have no other effect than to cause friction which has been happily absent during the 3 years of the war up to this time. Heretofore, there has been common sense recognition of nature's dividing lines. Any other policy can be interpreted only as due to ignorance of conditions. Certainly such orders should not come from anyone seeking the real welfare of the Negro race and the relationship between the races that all men of good will would like to see.

If troublemakers are responsible for this new situation, then troublemakers must be dealt with as such, because these troublemakers are a puny minority which must be shown that majorities rule here.

Since the establishment of our great air fields in this city, Montgomery's relationship has been most cordial with them and with the personnel they have brought among us. The officers and men of the fields have been the type that we were glad and proud to claim as friends and as participants in our social life. The fact that many of them were from the North, or from communities where the race issue is not pronounced, made no difference in the relationships, because the visitors recognized local conditions, had confidence in local judgment, and had respect for customs and traditions that have grown out of many years of trial and experience in the South. Furthermore, they were on the ground. They saw the conditions and the necessity for them. They were not desk men seated in some far-away place acting on some academic or idealistic impulse.

In Montgomery and in other Alabama and southern communities race relationships are a condition and not a theory. This is said kindly and firmly, and in the utmost friendship for the members of the Negro race. We want the Negro soldiers to have the same food, the same pay, the same uniform, the same courts, and the same kind of justice and the same protection as is given the white race. But political and economic and military equality are entirely different from the social equality that is implied in the new order for serving and seating of restaurant customers on the military reservations.

Our insistence upon this is in the interest not only of the white race but of the Negro race. We all know that we are to live side by side in the South, and each race is in a measure dependent upon the other. But domination by the race which is best qualified to dominate will be maintained at all costs. Efforts, even in a small way, to introduce any other practice bring only the deepest kind of resentment and encourage serious trouble.

These are facts which we cannot too firmly impress upon Army officials, our representatives in Washington, and all men everywhere.

Every Eligible Man and Woman in Service Can Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, there are still too many persons in high places who insist on perverting the facts concerning the so-called Federal ballot. These peddlers of misinformation and hate try to create the impression that their hearts are broken because the Federal ballot was defeated. These peddlers of misinformation talk loud and long about men and women in service not being given a chance to vote.

RECEIPT OF BALLOT PROVES THEIR CRIES FALSE

The very fact that you have already received or are about to receive a complete ballot giving you a chance to vote for every office from President down to precinct committeeman proves to you how false all their statements are. For that reason I want to give all men and women in service from my congressional district the true facts in this whole shameful performance.

WHAT WAS THE FEDERAL BALLOT

An explanation of what kind of ballot these people wanted to give you will be proof enough of their attempt to railroad an election. Here is what the Federal ballot was:

BALLOT

Write in the name of party or person you want for President _____
Write in the name of party or person you want for United States Senator _____
Write in the name of party or person you want for Representative in Congress _____
Write in the name of party or person you want for Congressman at large _____

THIS KIND OF BALLOT IS NOT AN HONEST BALLOT

This is the so-called Federal ballot. This is the ballot that these misinformers wanted to give the service men and women. It is an unfair, incomplete, and misleading ballot. No honest man would want such a ballot and no dishonest man should have such a ballot.

I do not in any way want to tell or even hint who the service men and women should vote for. It is your God given right to vote for Roosevelt, Dewey, or Thomas as you please. That is your privilege—that is what you are fighting for—the right to vote as you please.

Now, in all fairness, do you not concede that a Federal ballot such as shown above gives an unfair advantage to the man that is in office? President Roosevelt has an opportunity to visit all the camps and theaters of war. He has constant opportunity to visit with people engaged in the war. He has complete access to the radio—foreign broadcasts and service men and women broadcasts included. By his position the President has a tremendous advantage because his name is before the service men and women at all times.

On the other hand, Dewey and Thomas have no chance for such contact. Their names are seldom, if ever, given an opportunity to appear before the men and women in service. Under such conditions both Dewey and Thomas labor under an unfair disadvantage. It goes without saying that it is always easiest to write that name one sees most and hears most. Under this condition is it not fair to at least have Dewey's and Thomas' names appear on the ballot? The Federal ballot did not give these two candidates any chance whatever to get their names on the ballot or even give you a chance to know if anyone was running besides Roosevelt.

FEDERAL BALLOT HAD OTHER FLAWS

This ballot had many other objections and twists. How many of the men and women in service know, for instance, whether United States Senator WILEY or United States Senator LA FOLLETTE is up for reelection this November? A ballot without any names does not tell you that. With no names on the ballot, how could you even know who was running for United States Senator? How could anyone vote intelligently with such a ballot?

Likewise, how many men and women in service would know who is running for Representative in Congress from your district? Without any names on the ballot, how could you know? Besides, how many men and women in service know who Wisconsin's Congressman at Large is? Here is a joker—because Wisconsin has no Congressman at Large. But with this excuse of a ballot there would be thousands voting for Congressman at Large when Wisconsin has none.

This, then, is the "Federal ballot" that you heard so much raving about. It is a dishonest ballot, a ballot that misleads, and a ballot that thinks only one office in all America is important—the President. The only concern of the Federal ballot was the Presidency—that is all.

THAT IS NOT AMERICAN

Concern over only one office is not American. In Wisconsin we have a governor, a lieutenant governor, a secretary of state, a state treasurer, and an attorney general. In each county in Wisconsin we have a county clerk, a county treasurer, a district attorney, a register of deeds, a county coroner, a clerk of circuit court, a county sheriff, and a county surveyor. We also have a State senator and a member of assembly. All of these make up the America we are proud of.

Yet the Federal ballot would not give you a chance to vote for any office except President and Congress. Many of you who are in service held a county office before you enlisted. Your wives are maybe holding these jobs for you until you come back. Do you not want to be given a chance to vote for your wife? Of course you do. To thousands of men and women in service these county and State offices are closer to you and more important than President and Congress. Yet the Federal ballot said, "You vote only for President and Congress. You cannot vote for any State office or any county office."

I FOUGHT FOR AN HONEST AND COMPLETE BALLOT WITH NAMES ON IT

The ballot you received or will receive is the ballot I fought for and voted for. This ballot has names on it for national offices and gives every candidate an honest chance. At least you will know who is running for what.

You also received or will receive a complete State ballot. You can vote for governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, State treasurer, and attorney general. You also can vote for a county clerk—maybe your dad or uncle or aunt—maybe your wife or sweetheart. You can vote for a sheriff, clerk of court, register of deeds, surveyor, coroner, county treasurer, and county clerk. Yes; you can even vote for a precinct committeeman with the ballot you received or will receive. That is America. That is an honest election. A ballot with names and a ballot that is hard to defraud. The ballots you received or will receive are the ballots I fought for and voted for. With you giving your life for our country—the least that Congress could do for you is give you an honest ballot—with names—a complete ballot for National, State, and county offices. Yes; a President is important; but thank God that in America a President is not the whole cheese. To us from northern Wisconsin who know life the hard and honest way, a governor and a county office are just as important to us as a President.

SUPPORTED ALL VETERAN LEGISLATION

I am happy to report that in my 2 years in Congress I fought for and voted for every bill of benefit to veterans, men and women in service, and their dependents. All letters from service men and women receive my personal attention and first consideration. There is still much to be done. I shall always go all the way on all veteran legislation as I have in the past.

Good luck. Hope to see you back home soon. Be sure and vote. Vote as you please—and be sure you vote for every office from President down to precinct committeeman. Let us hear from you. Write Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Norris of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I desire to include the following editorial from the Nashville Tennesseean as a tribute to that great American the late George W. Norris.

The editorial follows:

NORRIS OF AMERICA

The life and success of George W. Norris comfort the common faith in the American democracy of which, in his lifetime, George W. Norris was the finest apostle. As our Nation has grown away from the days of its violent birth, when the concept of "faith in the people" was flashing bright, fewer and fewer great statesmen have risen among us to preach the ideals of democratic fundamentalism. The faith had remained as an inherited article, but not many bothered to renew the faith at the fire of conviction.

George Norris caught the torch from Jefferson, Mason, and Paine. Others who surrounded him in his long service in the Federal Government were more gifted, more artful, more eloquent. Norris stood above them and was recognized above them, by the serenity of his trust in his fellow men. He accepted literally the imperishable professions of the American Constitution. The people established the Government and government existed at all times to promote the general welfare and to be responsive to the public will. The people would not always be right, but under this Government their voice was vox Dei.

The people of Tennessee are peculiarly beholden to Senator Norris, and gladly have acknowledged their debt. Not only was he, by his vision and persistence, the father of T. V. A., but into the charter of T. V. A. was written his honesty which is its strength. For many years the Senator from Nebraska, Norris, came to be spoken of as "George Norris of the United States." To him the welfare of the whole had precedence over the interests of any part. There was nothing petty or provincial about him; he spoke in government the American point of view; he sought the greater good of the greater number.

Perhaps the meanest word ever spoken in the United States Senate was spoken by a jealous Tennessean who rose to twit the aged Nebraskan upon his defeat in his final candidacy. Had Norris, said this colleague, concerned himself less with the welfare of his Nation and more with the appointment of postmasters in Nebraska, he could have retained his seat in the Senate.

But George Norris will continue great in the hearts of his countrymen and the history of his land precisely because he placed principles before power. And it is for those who criticize his lack of political acumen to wonder why not they but he is received so securely in the esteem and affection of the American people.

In this Tennessee Valley region the massive dams stand in monument to George Norris of America and millions of people have their benefit each day of this man's life and service in the comfort of their living. One of these dams bears his name. The Tennessean has not the slightest doubt that somewhere in this region an even more special monument to Norris will be erected by a grateful people, and that this monument thereafter will be a shrine for all who keep faith with Paine and Mason and Jefferson and Norris—the faith of man in man.

Agnes Smedley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN S. GIBSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, on August 29 I brought to the attention of the House a very ugly attack made on the South by one Agnes Smedley, wherein she sought through malicious lies to bring hatred upon the southland and its citizenry, and also to excite race hatred and prejudice throughout the land.

At the time I made this address before the House I did not have any information whatever on Agnes Smedley as an individual, but stated then that she was either motivated by a large sum of money to promulgate these lies or that she was a part of the communistic C. I. O. gang, of which it seems that Sidney Hillman is now the big boss.

That the House and the people of this Nation may be further informed with regard to this person and her purposes, I want to impart to the membership and to the citizens of these United States some information that I have received with regard to her which I have every reason to presume to be the truth. The sources from whence this information came are certainly worthy of belief.

I learned that she is a regular contributor, and has been for the past 15 years, to the New Masses, which is an official organ of the Communist Party in the United States. I learned further that she is a contributor to the Daily Worker, also an official organ of the Communist Party. I further learned that she was an artist for the magazine known as Fight, which was the official publication of the American League for Peace and Democracy, which organization has been found to be a communistic front by Attorney General Biddle and the Dies committee.

In the year 1936 she sent greetings to and was sponsor of a banquet given in honor of Mother Bloor, so-called first lady of the Communist Party in the United States.

She is the author of many books which portray the glory of the Communist Party and its great works. She was the author of Short Stories from China, which was published in Moscow in 1935. She was the author of China's Red Army Marches, in which she describes in glowing language how the Reds with people other than white had overcome the whites in revolutions. She pictures the great benefits received from communistic revolutions. It is right significant that Robert Morss Lovett, whose communistic affiliations and activities have been subjects of concern to the membership of this House which by vote prohibited any further funds being paid to him from the Federal Treasury of the United States, wrote the preface to China's Red Army Marches, wherein he paid glowing tribute to this Agnes Smedley.

There also appears a paragraph that might be of some interest to the public in Benjamin Gitlow's book I Confess. It is probably known that Gitlow was in prison at Dannemora for sedition. The paragraph I refer to is as follows, to wit:

One day Agnes Smedley came to Clinton on the pretext that she was interested in prison problems. She was shown the prison and on her tour of inspection came across Jim Larkin, who knew all about her visit. He greeted her with a smile, which did not go unnoticed by the prison authorities, who became suspicious, investigated her, took her aside later, and ordered her to leave. Then followed a series of articles in the Socialist Daily, the New York Call, about the dungeon at Dannemora and the terrible treatment being accorded to the politicals, especially Jim Larkin. It was a grim story, part true and part good imagination (pp. 116–117).

I might further state that Jim Larkin was the Irish revolutionary imprisoned for his communistic propaganda in the United States.

When this much of the life and activities of this woman is known to the American public, I think it can easily be seen what her purpose was in compiling and permitting to be published the slanderous lies she did about the South.

I hope that the colored people of the Nation will not permit one with so vile a purpose to influence them and cause them to be a part of her un-American efforts to communize this country. I cannot imagine anyone that would suffer more as a result of this democracy being torn to shreds by such vultures and the populace of this great Commonwealth thrown under the rule of communism than the colored people of this Nation.

I appeal to the American people to wake up and crush the progress of this damnable cancer gnawing at the very vitals of our democracy. Frankly, I say to you if this is not done quickly, it is going to be too late.

Blue Skies for Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS ROLPH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, during the 10 days just passed, Poland has been much in the comments of speakers and editors. Five long years of agony have been the lot of the liberty-loving Poles.

We all vividly remember how on September 1, 1939, without the formality of declaring war, Hitler's hordes attacked Poland. The Nazis went in by land and by air. With an overwhelming advantage in airplanes of 4,320 Nazi to 443 Polish, the odds were tragically unequal. The struggle was over October 5, 1939.

The intervening years have been heavy indeed on a proud people. Dictators are harsh. Dictators are ruthless. Dictators are pitiless.

But, thank God, the forces of democracy are now relentlessly closing in on Hitler, Americans and British from the west, Russians from the east.

Poland will rise again. Poland will take her rightful place amongst freemen and free nations.

Americans on the Pacific coast join in saluting Poland in these days of renewed hope. Skies are clearing for Poland. Right is prevailing.

The San Francisco Examiner expresses our sentiments in an editorial devoted to heroic Poland. The article appearing August 31, 1944, reads in full:

HEROIC POLAND

September 1 will be the anniversary of one of the most momentous and tragical days in the thousand-year history of Poland.

For it was on that date in 1939 when Poland, as the first nation to defy the aggressions of Adolf Hitler, was attacked by the Nazi hordes.

The Polish Government had rejected Hitler's proposal for a joint attack on Soviet Russia, and so World War No. 2 began.

Now, at the beginning of the sixth year of the war Poland still fights on; and the brave hearts of her patriots are cheered by the approaching victory of the Allies.

Much of Poland's war has not been fought in Poland.

Polish soldiers—refugees from Poland and others—have been trained in Russia, in the Middle East, and in Britain.

Germans, as the Polish Telegraph Agency notes, "are surrendering to Poles on every front."

There were Poles in Africa with General Montgomery.

Monte Cassino was taken by Poles who are helping to drive the enemy up the Italian coasts.

Poles form a part of the allied armies that are fighting the great battle of France.

The Polish Air Force, composed of 14,000 men in 14 squadrons, is fourth in size among the United Nations, and Polish flyers have shot down 1,500 German planes during the war.

Likewise, the Polish Navy has kept the seas and is larger than ever, with a cruiser, six destroyers, three submarines, coastal vessels, and a merchant marine.

And in Poland itself, where the struggle has never ceased, Polish guerillas have been fighting steadily with sabotage, bombings, and wreckings; a home army which has replaced the original forces, trained and bivouacked in forests, has met the invaders in pitched engagements; and lately Polish defenders have risen up again within the walls of Warsaw.

With more than 500,000 in the resistance forces in the homeland, the Nazis have been compelled to keep three-fourths of a million troops immobilized in Poland, while on the other hand much aid has been given to the advancing Russian armies.

Moreover, there is an underground government in Poland—a "shadow state" with courts of law, industrial and agricultural departments, a parliament and 30,000 civil service workers.

But Poland has suffered terrible penalties, too.

Approximately 5,700,000 of her people have been exterminated—2,500,000 of them Jews, thousands of them Catholic priests.

Polish lads have been executed for the crime of belonging to the Polish Boy Scouts.

Farms have been looted and the buildings burned; and all cultural institutions have been closed by the Germans—all colleges, high schools, and professional schools.

And, of course, the Polish press was extinguished long ago.

The services and sacrifices of the Polish people should be gratefully remembered on September 1 in all of the United Nations.

Even more should they be remembered at Dumbarton Oaks, where the great powers are in conference, and at the tables of the peacemakers when the last shots of battle have been fired.

War Department Demobilization Plan After Defeat of Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following release issued by the War Department on September 6, 1944:

The Army has adopted a plan for the readjustment of military personnel after the defeat of Germany and prior to the defeat of Japan calling for a partial and orderly demobilization from its present peak strength.

When the war against Germany has ended, the military might of the United States will be shifted from the European area to the Pacific area. Military requirements in the European and American areas will be drastically curtailed, while tremendous increases will be essential in the Pacific.

To defeat Japan as quickly as possible, and permanently, the United States will have to assemble, readjust, and streamline its military forces in order to apply the maximum power. Our military requirements to achieve this end, involving men, weapons, equipment, and shipping, have been set forth by the Combined Chiefs of Staff. These requirements are the determining factors of the readjustment and demobilization plan adopted by the War Department.

Military necessity decrees that sufficient men suited to the type of warfare being waged in the Pacific must remain in service as long as they are essential. Certain units of the Army also, of necessity, will have to be retained in the various theaters where action has ceased in order to fulfill such occupation duties as are necessary. Other elements, no longer needed in the theater in which they are assigned, will be transferred to other areas, reorganized and redesignated to meet current military requirements in the theater, or they will be inactivated.

Within each element of the Army, thousands of individuals may become surplus to the needs of the theater or major command in which they are serving. But more thousands will be required for further military service.

First priority in this readjustment program will be the transfer of elements from theaters no longer active to the Pacific war zone, or from the United States to the Pacific war zone. All available transportation will be utilized for this tremendous undertaking.

The readjustment and demobilization plan developed by the War Department after months of study takes into account all of these variable factors. Briefly, the plan for the return of nonessential soldiers to civilian life will start with the assembly in the United States of men declared surplus to the needs of each overseas theater and to the major commands in the United States. From among these men some will be designated essential, and a substantial number will be designated as nonessential to the new military needs of the Army and will be returned to civilian life according to certain priorities.

As an example, the commanding general of the European theater of operations will be informed by the War Department of the types and numbers of his units which will be needed in the Pacific, and the types and numbers of his units which will remain as occupation troops, and the types and numbers of his units which are surplus.

The simplest plan of demobilization would have been to return these surplus units to this country and discharge their personnel intact.

Such a method, however, would operate with great unfairness to many individuals who have had long and arduous service but are not assigned to one of the units declared surplus. If only units in Europe were considered, this basis of expediency would work unfairly to units long in the Pacific or at outpost bases in the American theater. It would operate unfairly to men who have seen extended combat service both in Europe and the Pacific and have been returned to this country for reassignment. It would release men only recently assigned as replacements to units long in combat and would discriminate against veterans of many campaigns in units not selected for return.

Consequently, it was determined that the fairest method to effect partial demobilization would be through the selection of men as individuals rather than by units, with the selection governed by thoroughly impartial standards.

For the standards, the War Department went to the soldiers themselves. Experts were sent into the field to obtain a cross section of the sentiments of enlisted men. Thousands of soldiers, both in this country and overseas, were interviewed to learn their views on the kind of selective process they believed should determine the men to be returned first to civilian life. Opinions expressed by the soldiers themselves became the accepted principles of the plan.

As finally worked out, the plan accepted by the War Department as best meeting the tests of justice and impartiality will allow men who have been overseas and men with dependent children to have priority of separation. Ninety percent of the soldiers interviewed said that that is the way it should be.

As part of the plan adopted, an adjusted-service rating card will be issued to all enlisted personnel after the defeat of Germany. On this card will be scored the following four factors that will determine priority of separation:

1. Service credit—based upon the total number of months of Army service since September 16, 1940.

2. Overseas credit—based upon the number of months served overseas.

3. Combat credit—based upon the first and each additional award to the individual of the Medal of Honor, Distinguished Service Cross, Legion of Merit, Silver Star, Distinguished Flying Cross, Soldier's Medal, Bronze Star Medal, Air Medal, Purple Heart, and Bronze Service Stars (battle participation stars).

4. Parenthood credit—which gives credit for each dependent child under 18 years up to a limit of three children.

The value of the point credits will be announced after the cessation of hostilities in Europe. In the meantime the point values will be kept under continuous study. The total score will be used to select surplus men from the theaters overseas and in the United States. The score also will be used when a certain portion of all these surplus men will be declared nonessential and returned to civilian life.

In all cases, however, the demands of military necessity and the needs of the war against Japan must first be met. Regardless of a man's priority standing, certain types of personnel can never become surplus as long as the war against Japan continues.

As an example of how the plan will work, assume that there are four infantry divisions in the European theater. One is declared surplus. Men in all four divisions are rated according to the priority credit scores. The top fourth is selected and those not essential for retention in service by reason of military necessity are designated as surplus. Men in the surplus division who are marked for retention by reason of military necessity are then shifted into the active divisions. All of the men designated as surplus are shifted into the surplus division, which now will serve as a vehicle for eventually returning them to the United States.

No man in a unit that remains in service can become surplus until a qualified replacement is available. If military necessity should entail the immediate transfer of a unit to the Pacific, there may conceivably be no time to apply the plan to men of that unit before the emergency transfer is made. Consideration will be given these men when they arrive in the new theater.

The active units needed against Japan will be shipped to the Pacific. Those units required for occupation duty in Europe will be sent to their stations, and surplus units will be returned to the United States as quickly as possible.

In the United States, the men of these surplus units will revert to a surplus pool in the Army Ground Forces, Army Service Forces, and Army Air Forces. These surplus pools will include surplus men from all overseas theaters and surplus men from the continental United States.

From these surplus pools the reduction of various types of Army personnel will be made. The number to be returned to civilian life as no longer essential to over-all Army needs will be chosen from among those with the highest priority credit scores.

It is emphasized that the rate of return of surplus men from overseas will depend upon the number of ships available. Thousands of ships will be required to supply the Pacific theater. The Pacific theater will have No. 1 priority. All else must wait. To it will be transported millions of fighting men, millions of tons of landing barges, tanks, planes, guns, ammunition, and food, over longer supply lines than those to Europe.

This means that most of the ships and planes that were used to supply the European theater will be needed to supply the Pacific theater. The majority of ships proceeding to Europe will continue on to the Pacific laden with troops and supplies for that distant campaign. Very few will turn around and come back to the United States. The Army, therefore, will not be able to return all surplus men to the United States immediately. It may take many months.

While the process of selecting and returning men from the European theater is taking place, the plan for readjustment and partial demobilization also will be applied in active theaters, like the Southwest Pacific. Individuals in those theaters will be declared surplus to the extent that replacements can be provided. Naturally, since the Pacific will be the only active theater, there will be no surplus units of any type. Military requirements there will demand an increase rather than a decrease in fighting units. Nevertheless, troops in the Pacific area will benefit by the reduction of the Army, not as units, but as individuals.

Commanders in the Pacific area will be told the number and types of men who can be replaced. They then will select these men, using the same standards as apply in inactive theaters and in the United States. These men then will be returned to the United States as rapidly as replacements of the same type become available and as the military situation permits.

As an example: Normally there will be a great flow of men needed to build up and maintain an offensive against Japan, but say that several thousand men over and above the required number can be shipped to the Pacific each month. Then, a corresponding number of men in the Pacific with the highest priority credit scores can be declared surplus and returned to the United States, where their scores and military necessity will determine whether they are among the personnel no longer essential to the Army.

Simultaneously with the selection and return of men in the overseas theaters, the same selective formula will be applied among troops stationed in the continental United States. Troops in the United States, however, will serve as the main reservoir of replacements for the overseas theaters. For, in general, their priority scores will be lower than the scores of men who have served overseas and have seen combat duty.

Any man who may have been declared nonessential under this plan who wishes to remain in the Army, provided he has a satisfactory record, will not be forced out of the Army if he can be usefully employed.

In the case of officers, military necessity will determine which ones are nonessential. These will be released as they can be spared.

Priority of release for members of the Women's Army Corps will be determined in the same way as for the rest of the Army, but treating the Corps as a separate group. However, in the case of all female personnel of the Army, those whose husbands have already been released will be discharged upon application.

The plan as now adopted will provide some reduction in the Army's Ground Forces and initially considerably less in the Service Forces and in the Air Forces.

Following Germany's defeat, the Air Forces will have to move combat groups and supporting ground units from all over the world to the Pacific areas. The nature of the Pacific area dictates that Service Forces personnel will be needed in great numbers to carry the war to Japan. Long supply lines, scattered bases, jungles, primitive country, all contribute to the importance and necessity for Service Forces personnel. Therefore, the reduction in its strength will be slow at first.

As replacements become available from the Ground Forces and from new inductees, the Air Forces and the Service Forces will discharge a fair share of men proportionate with the Ground Forces.

Surplus individuals declared nonessential to the needs of the Army will be discharged from the Service through separation centers. Five Army separation centers are already in operation and additional ones will be set up when the need develops. A total of 18 in all parts of the country are contemplated. Their wide distribution will enable us to discharge soldiers close to their homes.

The readjustment and demobilization plan applies only to readjustment and demobilization in the period between the defeat of Germany and prior to the defeat of Japan. It sets forth the principles and responsibilities involved during that period. Theater commanders and commanders of all other major commands of the Army will put the plan into operation in as simple a manner as possible based on these principles and responsibilities.

The War Department has determined that the successful operation of the plan requires that the troops themselves, as well as the public, be kept fully informed.

The size of the military establishment that will be needed after the defeat of Germany has been calculated with the same exactness as the size of the Army needed up to now. No soldier will be kept in the military service who is not neded to fulfill these requirements. No soldier will be released who is needed.

It must be borne in mind always that the war will not be won, nor the peace enjoyed, until Japan has been completely crushed.

National Service Life Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, in World War No. 2, as in the former war, the Federal Government has established an insurance system for members of its armed forces. In the present war it is known as the national service life insurance.

National service life insurance in force is a most valuable asset. It is especially valuable to those who may be physically impaired as they may be unable to obtain any other life insurance protection. Even single persons with no present dependents may find it worth while to continue their national service life insurance for the protection of future dependents.

National service life insurance is granted only to persons in the active military or naval service, in any multiple of $500 but not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000, provided that not more than $10,000 of life insurance issued by the Government by virtue of service in the armed forces may be in force on one life at any one time.

The insurance is issued originally on the 5-year level premium term plan which furnishes, during the 5-year term period, the largest amount of temporary protection for the lowest premium payment, because the policyholder pays only what is considered necessary to cover the normal cost of the insurance within the term period.

The 5-year level premium term insurance while in force, in multiples of $500 but not less than $1,000, may be converted in the same or less amount, without medical examination, into permanent policies of national service life insurance on the ordinary life, 20-payment life, or 30-payment life plan at any time after the insurance has been in force for 1 year and within the 5-year term period.

The ordinary life policy provides the maximum amount of permanent protection for the minimum level premium payment, which is payable throughout the lifetime of the insured.

The 20-payment life policy provides the maximum amount of permanent protection for the minimum level premium payment, which is payable throughout the lifetime of the insured.

The 30-payment life policy provides that premiums shall be payable for 30 years. At the end of the 30-year period premium payments cease and the insurance continues in force for the remainder of the insured's life for the face amount of the policy.

At the option of the insured, in accordance with regulations, the permanent—converted—policy may be made effective as of the date any current premium becomes due on the 5-year-level premium-term insurance or as of the date any prior premium became due on such insurance, including the same date on which the 5-year-level premium-term insurance originally became effective. The converted policy will be issued at the premium rate for the age of the insured on his birthday nearest the effective date of the policy.

All permanent—converted—policies of national service life insurance have guaranteed cash, loan, paid-up, and extended insurance values available after the policy has been in force 1 year. Loans may be obtained at any time after the policy has been in force 1 year, and before default in the payment of any subsequent premium, in any amount not to exceed 94 percent of the cash value. Policy loans bear interest at the rate of 5 percent per annum.

It should be clearly borne in mind that term insurance provides the maximum temporary protection for the minimum cost and is desirable only for emergencies and for those persons who temporarily find it inconvenient to pay the higher premiums required on the permanent—converted—policies. The insured is advised to keep his 5-year-level premium-term insurance in force during the period of readjustment from military to civilian life and to convert it in whole or in part as soon as and to the extent he is financially able to pay the higher premiums on the permanent—converted—plans of insurance. In this way it is believed that the insured and his dependents will achieve the best ultimate results from his national service life insurance.

BENEFICIARIES

The insured has a right to designate a beneficiary or beneficiaries of the insurance within the following classes: Wife—husband—child, including an adopted child, stepchild, illegitimate child, parent, including parent through adoption and persons who have stood in loco parentis—in place of a parent—to the insured at any time prior to his entry into active service for a period of not less than 1 year, brother or sister, including those of the halfblood, of the insured.

The insured may designate, in addition to the principal beneficiary or beneficiaries, any person or persons within the permitted class as contingent beneficiary or beneficiaries. A contingent beneficiary so designated will take the monthly installments of insurance if the specified principal beneficiary should not survive so as to receive any installment or installments of insurance, or will take any remaining monthly installments certain if the specified principal beneficiary survives the insured and receives one or more monthly installments but dies before all the monthly installments certain have been paid.

The insured may change the beneficiary or beneficiaries within the permitted classes of persons herein specified at any time without their knowledge or consent by notice in writing signed by the insured and forwarded to the Veterans' Administration. Whenever practicable, such notice should be given on Veterans' Administration Insurance Form 336—Change of Beneficiary, National Service Life Insurance. A change of beneficiary may not be made by last will and testament although an original designation of beneficiary may be made by last will and testament duly probated.

DEATH BENEFITS AND MANNER OF PAYMENT

National service life insurance is payable in the event of the death of the insured while the insurance is in force, whether or not death results from a condition incident to military or naval service, to the beneficiary or beneficiaries entitled, in equal monthly installments in the following manner: Death benefits under national service life insurance are not payable in one sum.

If the beneficiary to whom payment is first made is under 30 years of age at the date of death of the insured, payments are made in equal monthly installments throughout the remaining lifetime of such beneficiary, with the proviso that such monthly installments shall be payable for 120 months certain. The amount of the monthly installment payable for each $1,000 of insurance under this life income provision is determined by the age of the beneficiary at the date of death of the insured, said age being determined as of the last birthday prior to or on said date, in accordance with the following schedule, which is based upon the American experience table of mortality and interest at the rate of 3 percent per year. Since most beneficiaries are women, the value of their installment payments under this life income provision is greatly enhanced by the fact that instead of an annuity mortality table, differentiated for sex, the much more favorable American experience table of mortality is used as a basis of calculation, combined with a 3-percent-interest rate which exceeds that usually used today by private insurers.

If no valid beneficiary is designated by the insured, or if the designated beneficiary or beneficiaries (including contingent beneficiaries) should not survive so as to receive any installment or installments of insurance, or should die prior to completion of payment of the monthly installments certain, the installments of insurance remaining unpaid at the death of the insured or of any beneficiary, as the case may be, shall be paid to the person or persons within the permitted classes of beneficiaries hereinafter specified and in the order named:

First. To the widow or widower of the insured, if living;

Second. If no widow or widower, to the child or children of the insured (including adopted children), if living, in equal shares;

Third. If no widow, widower, or child, to the parent or parents of the insured who last bore that relationship, if living, in equal shares;

Fourth. If no widow, widower, child, or parent, to the brothers and sisters of the insured, including those of the half blood, if living, in equal shares.

ACT ON INSURANCE WHEN DISCHARGED

The important thing for the newly discharged soldier to remember is that his policy has been kept in force in the past by automatic deductions from his pay but these deductions cease when he is discharged. His policy provides a 30-day period of grace for the payment of the premium but this is from the date of the last payment on the policy and not from the date of discharge.

After discharge the insured should forward to the Collections Subdivision, Veterans' Administration, Washington 25, D. C., within 31 days from the end of the period for which premiums were last paid, a remittance in the amount of the premium formerly paid by direct remittance or by allotment from service pay. Ordinarily the first premium after discharge is payable during the month following discharge. The remittance should be in the form of a check or money order made payable to the Treasurer of the United States and forwarded to the Collections Subdivision, Veterans' Administration, Washington 25, D. C. Do not mail cash or currency since such payments are sent at the remitter's own risk. Payments should continue to be made as premiums become due, whether or not premium notices are received from the Veterans' Administration, in order to insure continuous protection and avoid the possibility of lapse of insurance.

G. I. BILL OF RIGHTS

One of the broadest laws ever passed by Congress was recenty enacted in the form of Public Law 346, commonly referred to as the G. I. bill of rights. This law contains provisions for servicemen under 25 years of age to continue their education. It provides for loans to returning service people for the purchase of homes, farms, and business property. It contains provisions for reemployment assistance as well as readjustment allowances while the veteran is seeking employment.

Briefly its provisions include the following:

EDUCATION

A duly qualified veteran who desires further education is to begin the course of study not later than 2 years after either the date of his discharge or the termination of the present war, whichever is later. No education or training is to be afforded beyond 7 years after the termination of the present war. Furthermore, the law states that any such person who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service "shall be deemed to have had his education or training impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with."

Eligible persons are entitled to education or training, or a refresher or retraining course, at an approved educational or training institution. After a maximum of 1 year of such activity, and upon satisfactory completion of an education or training course, the individual is entitled to additional education or training for a period not to exceed the time he was in active service on or after September 16, 1940, and before the termination of the war. In no event may the total period of education or training exceed 4 years.

Expenses for this education or training are to be defrayed by the Government. Thus, for each veteran so enrolled, academic expenses, not to exceed $500 for an ordinary school year, are to be paid by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. While the veteran is enrolled and is pursuing a course, he is to be paid a monthly subsistence allowance of $50 if single or of $75 per month if he has a dependent or dependents.

LOANS

The same law provides for the guaranty of loans to veterans, not to exceed 50 percent of the loan, on a maximum loan of $2,000. Loans may be made by an individual or by a private or public lending agency and for the following purposes: purchase or construction of a home, making repairs, alterations or improvements to a home owned by the veteran, purchase by the veteran of a farm or farm equipment, or the purchase of business property.

The loans must conform to the following requirements: interest rate must not exceed 4 percent; must be practicable and suitable to the veteran's circumstances; the Government must have the right of subrogation to the extent of any guaranty paid; and the agreement must permit the Government to protect itself in case of default through the right to bid on foreclosure proceedings or to refinance.

ASSISTANCE IN OBTAINING WORK

To aid veterans in securing employment, the act states that "there shall be an effective job counseling and employment placement service for veterans to provide for them the maximum of job opportunity in the field of gainful employment." For this purpose, the law created a Veterans' Placement Service Board to cooperate with and assist the United States Employment Service. This board is to consist of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, chairman; the Director of the National Selective Service System, and the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency, or whoever may have the responsibility of administering the functions of the United States Employment Service. The board is to determine all matters of policy relating to the administration of the veterans' division of the employment service.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

The law likewise provides for former members of the armed forces who are unemployed. Eligible veterans who are not employed may receive a readjustment allowance not exceeding $20 per week for not more than 52 weeks of unemployment. However, a claimant will be disqualified from receiving an allowance if—

First. He leaves suitable work voluntarily, without good cause, or is suspended or discharged for misconduct in the course of employment;

Second. He, without good cause, fails to apply for suitable work to which he has been referred by a public employment office, or to accept suitable work when offered him; or Third. He, without good cause, does not attend an available free training course as required by regulations issued pursuant to the provisions of this title.

A claimant will also be disqualified from receiving an allowance for any week in which he was unemployed through a stoppage of work which was the result of a labor dispute. However, this disqualification does not apply if it is shown that—

First. He is not participating in or directly interested in the labor dispute which causes the stoppage of work; and Second. He does not belong to a grade or class of workers of which, immediately before the commencement of the stoppage, there were members employed at the premises at which the stoppage occurs, any of whom are participating in or directly interested in the dispute.

REDUCED RAILROAD FARE

For the duration of the war existing reduced round-trip railroad furlough fares available to military personnel of the United States Army, including Army nurses, authorized cadets, members of the Women's Army Corps, and personnel of the British Empire military forces, and armed forces of Allied nations have been authorized by the rail carriers to be continued for the duration of the war. The basis for the fares and the conditions under which they will be granted are given below.

A uniform must be worn and official leave, furlough, or pass papers must be presented to ticket agents and conductors when requested. Female nurses, when traveling in civilian clothes, will be granted the reduced fare only upon exhibition of official papers indicating that they are of the personnel of the United States Army.

The fare is approximately 1.25 cents per mile in each direction, with a return limit of 90 days after date of sale, permitting stop-overs at any station en route within limit of ticket upon application to conductor. Tickets will be coach class and will be honored in coaches or chair cars only, and will not be good for raise in grade to higher class of accommodations.

On certain limited trains the furlough-fare tickets will not be honored, but there is sufficient train service on all railroads on which the furlough tickets will be honored.

Government tax on transportation does not apply on tickets sold to the personnel of the United States Army and Women's Army Corps when traveling in uniform, but will apply on tickets sold to the personnel of the British Empire military forces when traveling in uniform and will apply on tickets sold to Army nurses when not in uniform.

The Rural Electrification Administration in Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, the largest and most fertile field for national restoration when peace comes will be found in the encouragement and development of small farms in the United States. The significance of this phase of post-war planning to the Nation does not end with the farmer, rather it begins with him. The hard work and straight-thinking characteristic of the American farmer and his family in a large measure contribute to the character and integrity of the American Government. Thus it is apparent that the benefits of legislation in behalf of the farmer inure to the Nation. We cannot help the farmer without contributing to the well-being of the Nation; we cannot legislate against the farmer without threatening the security and welfare of the Nation.

The National Government must plan now if the full benefits of progressive legislation designed to foster the well-being of the farmer are to be realized. With that thought before me I am asking Congress, the United States Department of Agriculture, and the various Federal agencies to assist the men and women in our armed services who desire to return to farms in the arable areas and to aid them in the securing of homes and land of their own.

Such an undertaking will mean a coordinated effort which will bring to all these small farms power and light through the rural electric cooperatives and the Rural Electrification Administration. In this country, and in my State of Pennsylvania, by the Rural Electrification Administration and the R. E. A.-financed cooperatives, not only have the farmers and their families benefited but industry and labor have shared and prospered through this great program.

The big job of electrifying American farm homes was well under way before the needs of the war effort temporarily halted line construction. There is much work yet to be done.

Some 65,000 Pennsylvania farms have received central station electric service for the first time since May 11, 1935, when the Rural Electrification Administration was established by an Executive order of the President. Over 30,000 of these farms are receiving service from the 13 R. E. A.-financed cooperatives now in operation in Pennsylvania. Service has been extended to 2,400 of these farms in the last 18 months under War Production Board regulations in the effort to save labor and increase food production.

Up to June 30 of this year, R. E. A. had loaned nearly $10,500,000 to the 13 Pennsylvania cooperatives. This has provided over 1,700,000 man-hours of work in the construction of rural power lines. Over $2,000,000 was spent for line conductors, $1,200,000 for transformers, $300,000 for meters, $350,000 for pole line hardware, and $1,900,000 for poles.

These farmers have spent $7,000,000 wiring homes and barns and $9,000,000 for electrical farm and home equipment such as milk machines and coolers, water pumps and systems, poultry equipment, electric tools and shop machinery, and household appliances such as refrigerators, quick freezers, ranges, washing machines, and irons.

The record in Pennsylvania is paralleled in the rest of the Nation. Three hundred and eighty-seven million dollars was loaned by R. E. A. to 813 borrowers for the construction of nearly 400,000 miles of pole line up to July 1 o fthis year. These lines are now serving well over a million rural homes. Think of what all this has meant to the farm home and American industry and labor.

Not only has the R. E. A. program directly benefited those farmers now receiving service from its borrowers, but farmers receiving service from private utilities have been helped through more liberal line extension policies and lowered rates as a result of the stimulus provided by the aggressive R. E. A. program. Private utilities have also benefited in Pennsylvania by selling all of the electric energy requirements of the R. E. A. cooperatives.

I am not only proud of what R. E. A. has done in Pennsylvania, but I am intensely interested in seeing that the program is continued with renewed vigor in the post-war period in order that no farm or rural home that can be reasonably reached with central station service will be without electric service. Electricity on the farm should be as commonplace and accepted as rural delivery postal service.

A bulletin entitled "Rural Electrification—A Post-War Market Forecast," has been recently published by the research department of the Curtis Publishing Co. of Philadelphia, Pa., for its magazine, the Country Gentleman. The figures shown in this bulletin are informative and I recommend it to each one of you for careful reading. It tells you what can be expected in your State and the Nation.

In this report it is estimated that over $3,000,000,000 will be spent in the United States for rural electrification in the post-war period and another $500,000,000 between now and the post-war period by both private and public agencies to serve over 5,000,000 farms and rural homes. This is big business.

In Pennsylvania alone it is forecast in the Curtis Publishing Co. study that a total of nearly $130,000,000 will be spent in the war and post-war period for line construction, farm and home wiring, appliances and electrical equipment, and plumbing equipment to serve 145,000 more consumers. More work for labor, increased business for industry, and better living on the farm.

The R. E. A. cooperatives in Pennsylvania have not had an easy job. Lean territory, active opposition from a few badly advised utilities, difficulty in obtaining low wholesale rates, and the need for helpful legislation made trying days for the early pioneers of area rural electrification in Pennsylvania.

However, progress has been made with the advent of low cost rural construction, better cooperation from private utilities in the matter of competition and wholesale rates, and a model State rural electrification act enacted in the days of the Earle State administration.

Much still remains to be done before we can economically reach all those who need electric service. Engineers must continue their struggle for lower cost construction; wholesale and retail rates must be lowered; cooperatives must be protected against unfair competition; and lower interest rates and more liberal terms for borrowing must be made available for rural line construction.

Following is a statistical summary of the funds advanced by R. E. A. in Pennsylvania as of June 30, 1944:

What Does the New Deal Really Offer Agriculture?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, at the present time the New Dealers are running around telling farmers that the New Deal has over $840,000,000 to give away to farmers before election time. Everyone knows it is their grandchildren's money which these new dealers are using to buy votes. They do not tell the farmers that a third of them will not even get $21 apiece, while the big landowners will continue to get checks up to $50,000 to $75,000 apiece.

The following statement by Franklin Carter—Jay Franklin—who was a special assistant to Secretary of Agriculture WALLACE is indicative of the attitude of the left-wing political agriculturists who have been helping to map the agricultural program of our Nation for the past 12 years. The statement follows:

The problem of farm relief will become not how shall we relieve the farmer but who shall relieve us of the farmer? The farmer has abrogated to himself all virtue and all knowledge. He has voted against progress, against civilization, against the city, against science, against art. He has made and unmade Presidents in the image of man. He has exhausted our soil as he will exhaust our Treasury if given half a chance. He is the great obstacle to human progress, the great threat to political stability. Sooner or later we shall discover, as England discovered, as Soviet Russia discovered, that the pagan, the landed proprietor, the kulak, is simply so much muck on the path of progress and must be swept aside if society is to advance.

The question now arises as to whether the farmer is going to be better off with TRUMAN replacing WALLACE. A man that is not held in very high regard by the farmers in his own State cannot be expected to get much support from other States.

The Missouri Farmer, a farm paper, sheds definite and undisputable light on the question in its January 15, 1944, issue. This is what it said on page 9 of that issue:

Since he has been in Washington Senator TRUMAN has never seemed friendly toward agriculture. At most he has been indifferent and at time he has appeared to be hostile toward the farmer's cause. He has constantly turned a deaf ear to all the pleas of the Missouri Farmers Association State Legislative Committee and at times when farm leaders have called on him in Washington and when replying to letters, he has seemed almost discourteous.

The Missouri Farmers Association is composed of 86,000 members. They are real dirt farmers. They have lived off their land by farming it, and Missouri has never had many large New Deal farm checks to live from as the State was figured safely New Deal by the New Deal.

The average farmer cannot see why funds were not provided to fulfill the commitments made on milk, eggs, pork, and other products when funds appear available for distribution in abundance at election time.

German Atrocities Against Minority Groups

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. MAY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, over the long and fretful months of the past tragic years of this war I have sat upon the floor of this House, listened to the speeches of the representatives of a free people, participated in debate, and helped to formulate and enact legislation for the prosecution of the war of defense of humanity against the wanton, un-Christian, and inexcusable attacks of the military regime of Adolf Hitler, who unquestionably sought to and did engulf the world in war to enslave all mankind because of his hatred of the Jewish people as a race and a minority group.

This Government was founded upon the principle that it is a government of law, and that the law is designed to protect the weak against the strong, and the poor against the rich. One of the principal foundation stones of this Republic is the right to worship God according to the dictates of your own conscience. It is my belief that Hitler pays homage to no God except the god of force, and that instead of fighting for a principle or for a cause, he has engaged in wholesale, relentless murder. He has violated every principle of international law and forfeited every right to humanitarian consideration.

My committee, in its investigation of American camps for prisoners of war, has found by interviews that there are prisoners in the same camp who are legitimate prisoners of war and are there to be treated as such; but along with them are others who are not only prisoners of war but belong to the group of murderers that slaughtered defenseless women and children whenever and wherever they could lay their filthy hands upon them. We read in the press accounts of wholesale murder of the populations of small towns, and then again we turn to other sources of information and we find that the Germans, under the direction of this ruthless, murderous dictator, maintained and operated gas chambers and infernos for the cremation of human beings by the thousands. They did not stop at the burning of soldiers of other armies, but they included in their murderous and torturous schemes the helpless civilian women and children of surrounding countries, and then engaged in the barbarous practice of selling their ashes in small containers to distressed and deluded relatives who believed that for a high price they were obtaining the sacred ashes of their loved ones.

This unspeakable conduct on the part of the German military machine is repulsive to everything human and decent. I denounce it, and denounce the German war lords as barbarians and savages, and I pray God that the time will never come when the world shall again be subjected to such relentless persecution and murder of minority groups because of their religious beliefs or business practices.

Mr. Speaker, these words may seem harsh, but I cannot afford, as a liberty-loving citizen of the greatest democracy on earth, to permit this Congress to recess without this expression of my resentment of the conduct of the vicious German regime.

Post-War Aviation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. JASPER BELL

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago Mayor John B. Gage, of my home city of Kansas City, Mo., appeared before the Aviation Subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, when it was in that city to inspect aviation facilities and needs there.

He made a statement before the subcommittee which I feel summarizes exceptionally well the problems that our Nation will face in the field of aviation in the post-war period after peace has been signed. His statement was made on August 28.

It is because I feel that the entire membership of the House and Senate should have this information for consideration that I am inserting his statement in the RECORD at this point:

It is a privilege indeed to have the opportunity of appearing before this committee at a time when it has under consideration matters vitally important to the future of aviation. I have told you in welcoming you to Kansas City that Kansas City and its people are deeply interested in the development and growth of aviation. We have put millions of dollars of our own city funds into the construction of two of the finest airports in the Nation—Municipal and Grandview. Almost directly across the river in Kansas City, Kans., is another great airport, Fairfax, developed largely at national expense to meet war requirements. Our local or city contribution to the cost of the two airports in Kansas City, Mo., has amounted to well over 50 percent of the total cost of construction as against a national average of only 20 percent for local contributions to total cost. Kansas City is the headquarters for two of the Nation's great air lines—T. W. A. and Mid-Continent. Many of our citizens derive their livelihood from aviation. Many former residents of this city, employees of T. W. A., are far away in Casablanca, Iceland, the Azores, and in England working in the great Army air transport services. Furthermore, the character and the climate of the region in which we live with our greater distances and relatively better flying weather create a greater need and demand for the rapid and convenient transportation which modern aviation affords than exists in more densely populated areas. It is therefore most natural that those complex and sometimes controversial problems concerning the post-war control and promotion of aviation which are the particular study of the members of your committee are of profound concern to us. We greatly appreciate this opportunity to give you the benefit of our experience and our conclusions as based on those experiences in the hope that an expression of our views may be of some aid to you in arriving at sound judgment.

At the outset I desire to discuss the proposals for the future development of airports and aviation facilities in the United States contained in the Randolph bill (H. R. 5024) and the Mott bill (H. R. 4811) now before your committee and the House of Representatives for consideration. Under these measures future Federal participation in aviation is to be channeled through State agencies hereafter to be established. Heretofore Federal-municipal relationship has existed in connection with the maintenance of public airports and aviation facilities. A Federal-State relationship would henceforth exist in respect to the construction and maintenance of public airports and aviation facilities. Airport development in towns and cities would be under the control of a department, commission, board, or official of the State known as a State airport agency.

Air-strip development away from congested centers along public highways would be under the control of the existing State highway departments. The Federal Commissioner of Public Roads would be the national authority cooperating with the State highway departments in respect to the development of air-strips outside of congested centers. The Civil Aeronautics Administration would be the Federal cooperating agency with the newly organized State airport agencies. Federal funds would be allotted to qualifying States on a complex formula based on population, area, and number of registered civil aircraft in each State. State funds would be raised by the taxes and fees assessed or levied on aircraft fuel and aircraft facilities or from State licenses for permits to participate in aviation. The approval of the Civil Aeronautics Administration would be required as to the location of airports, character of facilities to be constructed, standards of construction, and maintenance provisions before the joint funds could be expended by the State airport agency upon any specific project. Heretofore the States have not been actively interested in the development of aviation. Little or no State money or tax revenue has been invested in airport construction or maintenance. Manifestly, the proposed change in methods and in procedure is drastic and far reaching.

The justification for it is said to rest in the fact that a sufficient number of large class IV airfields have been developed in the centers of population where it is economically feasible to operate public air transport not only to supply the present needs of commercial air transport, but to meet future needs, and the airport construction of the future will largely be concerned with the provision of some 3,000 new airports in the small towns and cities of the country. These airports will be used very largely for nonscheduled flying and for private aircraft. No one challenges the need for the development of airfields in the smaller centers of population. The question is whether or not the past direct Federal-city relationship which has proved so satisfactory and beneficial to the localities and to the national air pattern can be successfully applied to the expanded program of the future, or should be supplanted with a direct and exclusive Federal-State relationship.

I believe that the present Federal-city relationship in respect to airport development can and should be continued and expanded and not supplanted by a Federal-State system. There is no reason to my mind why the Civil Aeronautics Administration cannot directly participate with the smaller cities and towns in the matter of airport development and maintenance as well as it has worked with the larger cities. The technique and experience of the C. A. A., in my judgment, can be of greater aid to the smaller communities than it has been to the larger cities. This seems to me to be so patent as not to require argument. The proposed shift to the Federal-State airport relationship probably results from the mistaken idea that airports are comparable to highways and that Federal airport funds should be handled as Federal highway funds have been handled. But airports are not comparable to highways. Airports are terminals—airways are the highways of the sky.

I know of no proposal to shift control of the facilities for aviation along these airways from C. A. A. to local authorities. Highways are of benefit to many users who live outside of centers of population and who can enter or leave them at will along their routes. Airports are of direct benefit primarily to the local subdivisions of government. These subdivisions take a pride and definite local interest in these airports. They are mainly useful and beneficial at the points of concentrated population and should therefore be the responsibility of those local political subdivisions of government, whether those local subdivisions of government be cities or counties. The construction of each airport, not only as to its primary location but as to the uses for which it it to be built are primarily matters of local concern and no two airport problems are exactly alike. Physical characteristics of terrain, potential volumes of traffic, types of business vary from place to place. They are not determined by the State population, or the State area, or the number of registered civil aircraft in the State. Furthermore, the setting up of these new State airport agencies would inevitably result in an immense amount of useless overhead. It would require swarms of new State administrative officials to construct, operate, and maintain these airports. The expense would have to be borne by the industry itself—an industry which we are most anxious to see go ahead free and unfettered by the dead weight of unnecessary cost and wasteful expenditure.

I am convinced that it is as necessary to maintain complete Federal control over the great air-sea that flows above us, irrespective of State lines or county lines or city borders, as it is to maintain Federal control over our navigable rivers and harbors. Licensing of those who engage in airplane operation, provision of safety standards, the control of traffic hazards, provision and management of airway lights and beacons, of control towers on airports justifying the operation of control towers should be and remain wholly and solely a Federal responsibility and activity. Nothing less than this makes sense from a safety standpoint. Otherwise State barriers of myriad character would rear their ugly heads and serve to defeat the primary purpose in transportation which the airplane is among other kinds of transport able to best achieve, namely, quick, rapid, and easy movement over great distance. Taxes on aircraft facilities and aircraft fuels might and would vary from State to State. In a fluid industry like aviation this would force arbitrary removal of operators from State to State. These taxes, if any, should be levied by the Federal Government, the revenue to flow back into the funds that go to promote the developments of this industry.

Take the situation that exists here in Kansas City. I have referred to the fact that we have a municipal airport in Kansas City, Mo. It is on one side of the Missouri River. On the other side of the Missouri River in Kansas is the Fairfax Airport. If Missouri imposed taxes on aircraft facilities and aircraft operation in the State of Missouri not similarly imposed on aircraft fuels and aircraft operation in the State of Kansas, the business on the Missouri airport would move for an artificial and unnecessary reason over to the other port in Kansas or vice versa.

Recently in connection with the operation of airport towers at the municipal and Fairfax ports we had a situation come up which illustrates the necessity for joint control of air traffic. The Army in expanding the Fairfax airport at the beginning of the war in order that it might adequately accommodate test flights of bombers to be constructed at the North American Bomber Plant adjacent to that field designed a runway, the approach zones of which intersected the main approach zones of the Municipal Airport of Kansas City, Mo., across the river. The design of the runway was in violation of the existing C. A. A. regulations. Protest was made by Kansas City, Mo., and formally filed, whereupon the Army Air Corps entered into an agreement to establish a joint-control tower and operate it for the two fields during the period of the operation by the Army of the Fairfax airport. Thereupon the protest was withdrawn and the runway constructed. The unified-control tower was not established but a unified operation of both control towers of the two fields was placed in effect and the expense thereof paid by the Army through the C. A. A. Several months ago the Army suddenly decided that they would abandon the operation of the control tower at the municipal field but continue to operate the control tower at the Fairfax field. Hazards inevitably incident to such abandonment and the establishment of a nonunified tower control at the two fields were pointed out. Soon the order of abandonment was withdrawn. It is certain that if independent operation of the control towers upon these two fields should be established and continue in the future, that accidents will occur in which innocent lives will be lost. It is therefore my opinion that on the airports where traffic demands control towers this should be a responsibility and activity of the Federal Government. There should be a unified control both of traffic upon the airways and in the approach zones to the landing fields. We know too keenly the very disastrous safety situation developed in connection with automobile operation in this country.

Loss of life and injuries incident to it have been vastly greater than those that have occurred, terrible as they are, in the armed forces of our country during the present war. And in substantial part that situation has developed from a lack of unified control over the licensing of automobile drivers and the safe construction of automobile highways. It is even more important to aviation that unified, coordinated Federal control continue with respect to the licensing of those who engage in civil or commercial aviation.

I want to commend the chairman of this committee for his interest in that subject. I hope he continues that interest until his ideas are represented by effective national legislation.

I have understood that it is urged that under this proposed legislation, particularly the Randolph bill, that Civil Aeronautics Administration could continue to exercise full authority with reference to the locale of new airports, the standards of their construction, and with respect to operation thereon or on adjacent airways. Under this view it is proposed that State airport agencies act only as sort of a political buffer between Civil Aeronautics Administration and local pressure groups. The C. A. A. would retain authority while the responsibility for action rested on the State agencies. The city officials would go to the State capitol and there a buck-passing act would be put on—between the State agency and the Federal Government. This makes more people sore, and justly sore, than anything I know. If there is anything we need in this Government of ours, it is to center responsibility where authority rests. I believe Civil Aeronautics Administration is fully as capable of resisting political pressure of a local character as would be any of the proposed new State agencies.

Many of our cities have invested large sums in their present airports. Many other cities have developed for the future far-reaching plans for further airport development. Federal-city relationship has successfully developed aviation in the past. There is no good reason why all this relationship should be now junked and destroyed. There are many reasons why it should not. I hope this committee sees fit to recommend to Congress legislation that will continue the Federal-local government relationship in respect to airport and air facility construction and maintenance. As to airstrips in the country adjacent to public highways, the Civil Aeronautics Administration should have close contact with location, construction, and maintenance. Existing State highway departments could play an important part in this connection and would together with the county governments be appropriate action agencies. But this should be kept well within the general orbit of control by the national aviation authority. So much for the domestic situation with reference to future airport construction.

In conclusion, I would like briefly to present to you our thoughts with reference to the future of American airplane operation in the foreign or international field. This is the subject of much discussion both here and abroad. We are interested here. Permit me to remind you that the vast majority of us out here in the Midwest are not monopolists or monopolistically inclined. We don't believe in monopoly, either in transportation or production. Our real prosperity and progress has come about when competition has been vigorous and at high tide. Then and then only jobs have been easy to get and business has been good. We are not, in other words, a tired and washed-up people. We believe in competition among ourselves and with others. Our boys exemplified this on their athletic fields and have again by their fighting spirit exemplified it on the battlefields of the world. Competition is not dead as an instrument of economic policy. Hence, we do not favor the so-called chosen instrument idea. Monopolistic governmentally fostered domination or operation of either foreign or domestic airline operations is anathema to us. We oppose proposals of that sort—born of the fear of change—unworthy of the resourceful and self-reliant American spirit, fostering and rendering inevitable stagnation and decay. We particularly do not want them applied to a new industry which we desire to see advance and grow and vastly expand.

By the same token proposed combinations of the different kinds of transportation, rail and highway, air and water, under joint management, eliminating real competition regionally and otherwise, are sternly objected to by the vast majority of our people. We recognize that in this technological age highly integrated operations are demanded; that we must have great corporations to conduct these far-flung and intricate business enterprises in important fields of industry and transport. The football field has its umpire; athletic competition has its established rules of the game. We recognize the necessity for public regulation of these industrial giants so that there may not be ruthless and unfair competition. What we believe in is regulation that doesn't supplant competition but rather encourages and protects it and maintains a situation permitting a fair and active contest in which each will profit according to his ability. We believe that this has been substantially the situation in connection with the past development of domestic commercial air transport under Federal regulations heretofore in force and effect. Let this be the fundamental policy governing the entrance of our domestic air lines into the foreign and international fields. We want to see them fly the airways of the world on that basis. An international aviation authority with control of traffic and safety standards should be established, but this control should not be one permitting limitation and restriction of commerce. The right of innocent flight over the lands and countries of others will have to be worked out between the individual nations. The right of cabotage, or internal operation in other countries, may or may not be granted by nations. Let us approach these problems as Americans who are not afraid of the effect of competition. And from what I know about our aviation, our commercial aviation, which was just as far ahead of European aviation as our military aviation was behind at the outset of the war, I believe that our operators will in a fair competitive field hold their own in the post-war era with the airline operators of all other nations.

Finally, let me congratulate you, members on this committee, as the representatives of a national legislative body, our Congress, which has indeed done much for a commercial aviation in the past and which, I believe, will continue to do so in the future.

Can Elections Be Bought?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED. V. IZAC

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to my unanimous-consent request to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article entitled "On the Other Hand," by Lowell Mellett, appearing in the Washington Evening Star of September 6, 1944:

ON THE OTHER HAND—HILLMAN FIGURES MAKE ELECTION-BUYING CHARGE APPEAR SILLY, SAYS WRITER

(By Lowell Mellett)

There are too many things to write about. For instance, there is that intriguing statement made by Sidney Hillman to the House Campaign Expenditures Committee: "The total expenses of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee to date are considerably less than the 1940 contributions to the Republican Party by five wealthy families alone."

Everybody surely would like to know the names of the families. The accepted source of information on the subject is the Report of the Special Committee to Investigate Presidential, Vice Presidential, and Senatorial Campaign Expenditures, 1940.

This official report reveals that the five families are the Rockefellers, the Du Ponts, the Pews, the Sloans, and the Queenys.

The five families gave a total of $432,680, it seems. That is the figure that Hillman apparently would like to have contrasted with $371,086, which he says is the total expenditure of the C. I. O. committee up to August 15. And most of that, he says, was spent for salaries and travel, office rent, equipment, and publicity. Only $67,430, he says, was expended or contributed in primary campaigns or State elections.

MAY HAVE GOOD POINT

If Hillman's figures are correct and the Senate committee's figures are correct, it looks as if Hillman really has a point there. And since Hillman is chairman of the board of one large bank and director of another, he is not apt to be careless with figures. Still he was not very exact in the use of another figure. He said the Republican Party and its cooperating groups (G. O. P. equivalents of the Political Action Committee) had "collected and spent some $17,000,000" in 1940. If he had wanted to be precise, he should have said that $18,156,332 was collected by the G. O. P., but only $16,621,435 spent. That left $1,534,897 not used. These are the figures in the Senate committee's report.

The C. I. O. committee started out to raise $1,500,000, or a little less than the G. O. P. committee had left over last time. It succeeded in raising only $671,214, however, and succeeded in using only $371,086. That makes all of the talk about the C. I. O. buying up recent primary elections and its alleged plans to buy up the November election sound a little silly, doesn't it?

Anyhow, you now know who the five families are:

Let's turn, then, to another gentleman who has been getting his name in the papers—Mr. John Foster Dulles. In writing about him, the boys usually say he will be Mr. Dewey's Secretary of State—if.

A friend has kindly furnished a speech made by Mr. Dulles before the New York Economic Club on March 23, 1939. The friend points out one sentence which he seems to think is significant of something. It reads: "Only hysteria entertains the idea that Germany, Italy, or Japan contemplates war upon us."

BORAH'S REMARK RECALLED

This recalls Senator Borah's famous statement to the Senate, "My information is that there will be no war," when he was leading the fight against repeal of the arms embargo that same year. Probably more will be heard of Mr. Dulles' unfortunate utterance if he continues to be Governor Dewey's secretary-of-State-in-waiting.

That brings us to another maker of news, Representative HAROLD KNUTSON, of Minnesota, ranking Republican member of the House Ways and Means Committee. Mr. KNUTSON was leading the fight in the House the other day against a proposal to provide unemployment compensation for Federal workers—meaning workers in navy yards, arsenals, and the like, as well as Washington and way points—who may need such help when demobilization begins. He declared, "That would add $5,000,000,000 to the operating expenses of the Government." He did not disclose how he reached this preposterous figure, but went on to shout:

"How are we going to restore normalcy in this country when Congress is shoveling out money in scoops?"

Mr. KNUTSON has found a campaign slogan for his party—"Back to normalcy."

O. P. A. Campaign Against Upgrading of Butter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. R. POAGE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, as an illustration of the activities of the dairy products manufacturing group—the group that has so long prevented the American housewife from buying a wholesome and convenient table spread made from the vegetable oils of American soybean and cottonseed, I submit the following official release from the Office of Price Administration:

Savings to housewives of about $15,000,000 annually in what they pay for butter are anticipated as a result of a broad campaign to eliminate upgrading, which results in sales at over-ceiling prices, the Office of Price Administration announced today.

The campaign, which was begun by O. P. A.'s enforcement department last June, will cost less than $5,000 a year officials estimate.

Here is how the project is proceeding:

O. P. A. has obtained the services of butter graders employed by the War Food Administration. Some of these graders work in the big Middle West butter producing area. Others work in butter concentrating centers on the east and west coasts.

These butter graders examine butter being prepared for shipment from concentration points. A concentration point is an interim storage center in which butter from producing creameries is accumulated by large wholesale distributors prior to shipment to butter consuming areas throughout the country.

O. P. A. investigators, working with the butter graders, make a note of the place to which a shipment being graded has been consigned. Suppose, for instance, a shipment of butter at a concentration point in the Middle West has been graded and is consigned to New York City. The investigator prepares a grading certificate for the shipment, and prepares a duplicate, which is forwarded to the O. P. A. regional office in New York City. From the New York office an O. P. A. representative contacts the receiver of the shipment of butter, and checks to make sure it was invoiced and sold at the legal price for the grade.

Butter is graded 89-score, 90-score, 92-score, or 93-score, according to tests including the factors of smell and taste. By selling 89-score butter at the O. P. A. ceiling price for 93-score butter, a wholesale distributor could obtain as much as 2 cents per pound above the legal 89-score ceiling price.

The practice of selling one grade of butter at the price of a higher grade is known as upgrading.

Any sales at the wholesale distributor level above legal ceiling prices cost the American housewife money, for retail store ceiling prices are calculated by adding percentage markups to the prices per pound that the store pays for the butter it sells.

It has been estimated that normally only 10 percent of all butter produced in the United States is the 93-score top grade. A check in June of this year, just before the O. P. A. campaign against upgrading started, however, disclosed that at that time an estimated 90 percent of all butter was being sold as 93-score grade. "There just isn't that amount of 93-score butter produced," an official said.

Since the beginning of grade checking by O. P. A. officials, a big dent has been made in upgrading, O. P. A. said.

With the cooperation of the industry's premium butter producers and distributors who want traditional standards of the trade maintained, more upgrading is expected to be eliminated, O. P. A. added.

Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that it is not the dairy farmer nor the small store distributor who is engaging in this dishonest practice. It is the same people who have so long colored and renovated butter, and who have at the same time been responsible for the remarkable legislation which actually requires naturally yellow oleomargarine to be bleached before it can be sold without a confiscatory tax.

Must a Veteran in Need of Hospitalization Swear to a Pauper's Oath?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to have inserted in the RECORD the following resolution adopted by the Vincent B. Costello Post, No. 15, the largest American Legion Post in the District of Columbia and one of the largest in the Nation. The resolution is worthy of consideration by every Member of Congress:

Be it resolved, That the existing and written method of interrogation for admission to veteran hospitalization, as nonservice connected patients or as service-connected patients seeking treatment for ailment other than cause of discharge—either emergency or extensive cases—is un-American, degrading, and in addition clothed with the dubious but legal power of subjecting a veteran of the world wars to the possibility of prosecution by arrogant or antagonistic governmental bureaucrats.

Whereas that the membership of this post respectfully suggests that Veteran Administration officials be requested to authorize and institute a more democratic and more appropriate procedure of ascertaining and determining the financial status of an applicant or his/her eligibility for hospital treatment.

Whereas that these pleadings are not submitted for the intention of removing proper or necessary restrictions and safeguards for hospital admittance but to eliminate the apprehension of being stigmatized in official records by a so-called act of pauperism, and to remove the contingency of being coerced or threatened by overzealous public officials: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Vincent B. Costello Post No. 15, of the American Legion, Department of the District of Columbia, is authorized and directed to recommend for the consideration by the delegates of the national convention of the American Legion to be assembled at Chicago, Ill., September 18–20, 1944, the deletion of questions Nos. 5 and 9, respectively, from Veterans' Administration

Form P–10 "Application for Hospital Treatment or Domiciliary Care," otherwise known as the "pauper's oath."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

PRIVILEGES, RIGHTS, AND BENEFITS FOR MEMBERS OF THE UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES AND THEIR FAMILIES

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, in the Michigan counties of Saginaw, Shiawassee, Gratiot, Clinton, Montcalm, and Ionia there is scarcely a family without relatives engaged in the great struggle of World War No. 2, either in Europe or in the Pacific.

In the present and recent sessions of Congress we have passed many laws to provide benefits to servicemen and their families, yet I frequently learn of citizens who are not aware of the possibility of their entitlement to benefits under these laws.

Congress has been cognizant of the impact of the war on our service families and laws have been passed to make their lives a little more bearable and a little more livable despite the great sacrifices these people have been making. Increase in the pay of the serviceman over that of former wars, provisions for the protection of his financial interests while he is in the service, allotments to his immediate family to ease the financial load, disability and hospital benefits, and the more recent G. I. bill with its many facilities, are among the steps taken by Congress as token evidence of a grateful nation.

In order that men and women of the armed forces from the Eighth District of Michigan and their families at home may have some idea of the various privileges, rights, and benefits of congressional enactments, I desire to submit to them this summary with the hope that it will prove helpful. Should any of them feel they are not receiving benefits to which they are entitled, or should they feel that I can be of assistance in handling matters with the War and Navy Departments and the Veterans' Administration, I shall give their cases prompt attention if they will write me in detail and address me as follows: Congressman FRED L. CRAWFORD, 1123 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

It is important in this connection that the person writing his Member of Congress supply the full name, home address, and the military address and Army or Navy serial number if the service person involved is still in the service, and if the person has been released, then the discharge number should also be included, together with the date of discharge. Frequently it is also helpful to have the last copy of a letter received by the individual from the official agency with which they have carried on correspondence, if the case has been pending.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Provision has been made to give a measure of financial assistance to dependents of servicemen while the breadwinner is in the uniform of his country. A plan known as the Servicemen's Dependents Allowance Act has been worked out whereby the Federal Government makes a financial allowance to dependents in certain categories and this is supplemented by a contribution which is made by the serviceman from his monthly pay. A soldier with a wife and one child sets aside $22 per month of his pay and the Government makes an outright allowance of $53, providing a monthly check of $80 for the wife and child. There are three principal classes of dependents benefiting under this act. They are known as class A dependents, class B dependents, and class B–1 dependents, and their classification and the amount they receive follows:

Class A dependents: A wife, $50; a wife and one child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife, up to $42; a divorced wife with one child, $72; a divorced wife with each additional child, $20. Note: A wife separated or divorced from a man in service will get no more than the amount fixed in a court order or decree in case of alimony. If the divorce or separation order does not call for alimony or separate maintenance she will not receive any allowance.

Class B dependents: A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent and any number of brothers and sisters, $37; two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37. Note: Class B dependents, it must be clearly understood, are dependents who are only partially dependent upon service men and women for support. In other words, if the dependents are dependent upon men or women in service 50 percent or less, but are still substantially dependent, they come under class B. Only $37 is allowed no matter if there are one or even four or five more partially dependent. Those who make application for family allowance, therefore, should be very careful to show the full degree of their dependency. This is important.

Class B–1 dependents: One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; and each additional brother or sister, $11. Two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $79; two parents and each additional brother or sister, $11; a brother or sister but no parents, $42; each additional brother or sister without parent, $11. Note: These persons must be chiefly dependent on the serviceman.

Ordinarily, the monthly family allowance is payable from the first of the month in which application is filed by the enlisted man or by or on behalf of a dependent. For any month in which a monthly allowance is paid, the monthly pay of the enlisted man is reduced by or charged with the amount of $22, and with an additional amount of $5 if the dependents to whom such allowance is payable include more than one class of dependents. However, an initial family allowance will be paid by the Government to the designated dependent or dependents with no reduction in or charge to the pay of the enlisted man when written application therefor is filed by the enlisted man within 15 days after the date of his entry into active service.

WHO CAN APPLY?

In event the service man or woman for some reason fails to make application, or is in a position where he or she cannot make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. The Army requires their regular application blank to be filled out. The Navy requires merely a letter giving the name of applicant's wife and children, dates of birth, and so forth. Therefore, if any class A dependent does not know for certain just how to apply, he or she could well write a Member of Congress and ask for instructions.

However, dependents falling in the category of class B and B–1 dependents cannot file applications forcing an allotment from the man or woman in service. Family allowances are compulsory only when applied for by class A dependents.

It should also be pointed out that even though the serviceman's wife and child may be receiving $80, for instance, that does not eliminate the possibility of the dependent parents receiving assistance. In cases where dependents of two categories receive an allowance, then only $5 additional is withheld from the serviceman's pay, irrespective of how many additional dependents are benefited. In other words, $27 a month is the most that can be taken out of a soldier's pay under the servicemen's dependents allotment allowance plan. Parents can also be helped by more than one child in the service if they are actually dependent on more than one.

MISSING IN ACTION

There has recently been called to my attention the matter of pay and allowances in connection with persons missing in action. In such cases where any person in active service is officially reported as missing, missing in action, interned in a neutral country, or captured by an enemy, he is entitled, while so absent, to receive or to have credited to his account the same pay and allowances to which he was entitled at the beginning of the absence, or may become entitled to thereafter. Any such person who has made any allotment of pay for the support of dependents or for payment of insurance premiums is entitled to have such allotments continued for a period of 12 months from date of commencement of absence. Where such person may not have executed an allotment or where the allotments made are not sufficient for the reasonable support of dependents or payment of insurance premiums, the head of the service department concerned may direct that allotments not exceeding the amount of pay and allowances the missing person would be entitled to allot be paid to the insurer or to such dependents as have been designated in the official records or as may be determined by the head of the department. When the 12 months' period has expired and no official report of death, or of being a prisoner, or of being interned has been received, the head of the department concerned, after a full review of the case, or following any subsequent review of the case may direct a continuance of the person's missing status, if the person may reasonably be presumed to be living, or make a finding of death. When a finding of death is made, such date is the day following the expiration of an absence of 12 months or where the missing status has been continued on a day determined by the head of the department.

When it is officially reported that a person missing under the foregoing conditions is alive and in the hands of an enemy or interned in a neutral country, the payments authorized may be made for a period not to extend beyond the date of receipt by the head of the department concerned of evidence that the missing person is dead or has returned to the controllable jurisdiction of the department concerned.

Dependents, upon receipt of information from the War or Navy Department, that a person in the armed forces is missing, or has been captured, should immediately write to the head of the branch of the armed service in which the man was serving, giving name, rank, organization, and serial number; also setting forth the need for financial assistance, and at the same time state whether or not the missing or captured person had previously made an allotment. Dependents of such persons, upon receipt of advice from the service department concerned that such person has been officially reported dead, or that a finding of death has been made, should file claim for death pension benefits with the Veterans' Administration in order to protect their rights.

The monthly family allowances are not assignable or subject to the claims of creditors and are not liable to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal process.

The family allowance provisions also apply in cases of women in the service on the same basis as related here except that the husband and children must show that the servicewoman is their chief support.

GRATUITY PAY

A gift, known as gratuity pay, is provided by the Federal Government in the case of the death of a serviceman from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct. This is an amount equal to 6 months' pay at the rate received by the serviceman at the time of his death. This is payable to the widow or child of the serviceman or any dependent he may have designated. It is not necessary that death be in line of duty. The serviceman cannot designate the recipient of this gratuity in a will.

The War Department usually sends the widow or child the forms necessary in connection with receipt of this gratuity pay. Should these not be received within a reasonable time after receipt of official notice of death of the serviceman, I shall be glad to have them sent upon receipt of a request for the same.

In cases of persons reported missing in action the gratuity pay is not issued until the expiration of 12 months after the date of the report or until an official report of death has been made.

COMPENSATION AND PENSION

Veterans of World War No. 2, as well as veterans of World War No. 1, who are disabled may either be entitled to compensation or pension. These payments run from $6 to $250 per month and depend on whether the disability is service or non-service connected and on the nature, degree, and permanency of the disability. Veterans' inquiries concerning these matters should be addressed to Mr. Guy Palmer, manager, Veterans' Administration, Dearborn, Mich.

Pension may also be due World War widows or minor children if the soldier died of a service-connected disability or had some service-connected disability of a measurable degree.

Provision has also been made for payments to widows, children, and dependent parents of veterans of World Wars Nos. 1 and 2 based upon death in service or service-connected death. The rates payable are as follows:

Widow, no child	$50
Widow, 1 child (with $13 for each additional child)	65
No widow, but 1 child	25
No widow, but 2 children (with $10 for each additional child)	38
Dependent father and mother:
Each	25
Or 1 only	45

The widow or children of a deceased veteran of either World War No. 1 or No. 2 may be entitled to payments if the veteran's death was of a non-service-connected nature, but if he had a disability at the time of his death that was incurred in or aggravated by such war service.

MEDICAL TREATMENT AND DOMICILIARY CARE

Hospital treatment, or out-patient medical or dental treatment, including necessary medicines and prosthetic appliances, with institutional training in the use of such appliances, may be furnished certain veterans medically determined to be in need thereof, for service-connected disabilities. Out-patient treatment may also be authorized for any non-service-connected condition which is associated with and aggravating a service-connected disability, as adjunct treatment.

Hospital treatment or domiciliary care for non-service-connected disabilities under certain conditions may be furnished, when needed, for any war veteran not dishonorably discharged, or for any peacetime veteran discharged from service for disability incurred in line of duty or who is in receipt of pension for service-connected disability.

Transportation to, and back from, Veterans' Administration facilities, when authorized in advance, for examination, medical treatment, hospitalization, or domiciliary care.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

Most members of the armed forces will be entitled to mustering-out pay when they are discharged. The rates run as follows:

Three hundred dollars for persons in the service 60 days or more who served outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska. This will be paid $100 at time of discharge, $100 in 30 days, and $100 in 60 days from discharge.

Two hundred dollars for persons who served at least 60 days and within the United States to be paid $100 at time of discharge and $100 in 30 days of discharge.

One hundred dollars for persons who served less than 60 days and payable at discharge.

Will We Win the Peace?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article written by me entitled "Will We Win the Peace?" written for the Jewish Forum:

If by winning the peace we mean the growth and extension of the democratic idea, then I firmly believe that we will win the peace. We will win because as a nation we try. The late Stephen Vincent Benet said that in ringing terms in his castigation of totalitarianism, Nightmare at Noon. As a nation I think we try—try to give all men equal opportunity, strive to build the better life, work for the creation of a better world order.

We sometimes backslide. The flesh is sometimes weaker than the spirit, but we try. Our heart is in the right place, and that is what counts.

I believe, too, that there is plenty of evidence of progress. There is, for instance, the fair employment practices program. The committee is turning up evidence of discrimination. But the very fact that there is such a committee shows progress and that we are on the road to removing a blot on our society.

Post-war planning is in the air in Washington. How successful such planning is will be the deciding factor as to whether we win the peace. But everyone is trying. Everyone is aware of the problems and our shortcomings of the past. It will be a hard and long road to win the peace. Perhaps a longer and harder road than the one we are traveling today in the war. But win we will.

We are sometimes shocked by evidences of reaction and bigotry, by the plaform of an American First Party, by an outbreak of vandalism, by an obvious effort to discriminate in employment. But for every such factor there are dozens of examples of progress, of good will and democratic growth. They do not catch the public eye, because they are not so spectacular. It is the disturbing element, the act which arouses righteous indignation, that gets public attention, sometimes out of all proportion to its importance. We must keep things in focus.

I think we will win the peace because I have faith in America.

Criminal Waste

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying, "Waste not, want not." If there is anything that the American people and its Government should conserve and save for the future it is Nature's precious gift of petroleum energy, the gasoline that has freed mankind from so much arduous labor—the power that plows our fields, plants and harvests our crops; power that processes and brings our food to our table; power that has made Alladin's dream come true—petroleum energy that takes us wherever we want to go for pleasure or profit, energy that has conquered the skies and the sea, Nature's greatest gift to man, a boon that our extravagance will deny to posterity. If there is anything that this generation should conserve it is our wasting asset petroleum and the precious gasoline which it supplies. We know that Government officials are notoriously wasteful.

The office files of Congress are replete with reports of Government extravagance and wasteful practices that many of us strive to correct to little avail. But a letter from a responsible educator addressed to Senator THOMAS and sent to all the members of the Idaho congressional delegation calls attention to the most wasteful practice and destructive methods of the Army in the State of Idaho that is beyond reason and little short of criminal.

If low-test gasoline is being burned by the Army—gas that could be used to do everything that tractors and trucks can do to produce and transport food to feed the hungry mouths of this world—then this practice of the Army should be made the subject of a congressional investigation.

There is submitted herewith for the consideration of the House the report of the burning of gasoline by the Army:

BOISE, IDAHO, August 30, 1944.

The Honorable JOHN THOMAS,
United States Senator, Idaho,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. THOMAS: The matter which I wish to mention here, we feel is of vital concern to everyone, not only in Idaho but throughout the United States.

For weeks; yes, months, we have noticed great black clouds of smoke back of Gowen Field. We have even thought or mistaken it for an airplane wreck. Upon careful inquiry, these are the facts, if we may call them facts, we have been able to gather. When a tank (railway or truck) of gas comes in to Gowen Field, that is under the required 110, or whatever the standard is, for high octane, the gas is dumped out and burned.

Many people here know about this for I have been told this by a number of different individuals. Why steps to stop such waste have not been taken is a marvel to me. An army officer recently while in a barber shop, said he had labored all day with the base commandant, or officer in charge, to turn a tank back for civilian use, but to no avail.

When we civilians have a hard time getting enough gas to carry on our legitimate occupations, it gets under our skins to have the Army commit such colossal wastes. Now we don't mean by that that we are unwilling to cooperate, skimp, and save for victory. We are glad to save for a purpose, but we resent very much not only what that means to our already dwindling national oil reserves, but also what it means to the taxpayer's pockets, and the use of such gas for civilians.

We believe that Congress is the one body that can put teeth into a rule or law to prevent such wastes. That saving should not be limited to the individual citizen.

We suggest that all members of the Idaho delegation in Congress be apprised of this condition, for we feel that what goes on at Gowen is probably common practice in many, if not all air bases, or other bases for that matter.

Yours very truly,

C. A. SAXTON,
Grade Principal, Franklin School.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following baccalaureate sermon by William Mather Lewis, president of Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., June 18, 1944:

LIVING MEMORIALS

(By William Mather Lewis)

In the account of the transfiguration as recorded in the Gospel according to St. Matthew we find these words: "And after six days Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart: and was transfigured before them: and His face did shine as the sun, and His raiment was white as the light.

"And, behold, there appeared unto them Moses and Elijah talking with Him.

"Then answered Peter and said unto Jesus, Lord, it is good for us to be here; if Thou wilt, let us make here three tabernacles; one for Thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elijah.

"While he yet spake, behold a bright cloud overshadowed them; and behold a voice out of the cloud which said, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye Him."

This was a great experience for the three simple men who left the great company of people in the valley and journeyed with Jesus to the mountain top. For they had seen talking together, Moses representing the law, representing also those who had passed through death into the kingdom; Elijah representing the prophets and those who entered the kingdom through translation, and Jesus the Messiah, for whose ultimate appearing the lawmakers and phophets had eagerly looked during the centuries.

They were stirred to make some adequate recognition of this momentous event. "Let us build here three tabernacles, one for Thee, one for Moses, and one for Elijah." Here was the age-old reaction of man—to memorialize a great event with a monument, a statue, a cairn, a pyramid.

It has been man's desire since the dawn of civilization to erect monuments to perpetuate their own names or the names of those whom they admire. The earth is strewn with such structures too often symbolic of man's vanity rather than of his achievement. In saying this I do not question the motives of Peter or suggest that the tabernacles would have had no value. I merely point out that his conception was inadequate. Marcus Cato well said, "I would rather have men ask why I have no statue than why I have one." The voice from the clouds said, "This is my beloved Son, hear ye Him." This was, indeed, the answer to Peter's suggestion. Earthly tabernacles could not properly memorialize the event—there must be "a building of God, an house not made with hands eternal in the heavens" built on the teachings of Jesus.

"Can storied urn, or animated bust
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
Can honour's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or flatt'ry soothe the dull cold ear of death?"

I have never seen statistics relative to the amount of money wrapped up in memorials throughout the United States. It must total hundreds of billions of dollars.

Now we are approaching another period when countless people will wish to erect monuments to those who have given their lives or have done some great deed, that we might continue to live in a free country.

God forbid that we should erect dead memorials as has been the custom in the past. After the Civil War few communities in the land failed to erect an angular monument surmounted by the metal effigy of a soldier. Washington parks and circles are disfigured with grotesque equestrian statues. Freakish structures mark many historic spots.

What memorials shall we erect? What will be worthy of the boys who laid down their lives at the Anzio beachhead, along the French coast and in the islands of the Pacific?

If our beloved sons could speak, they would ask us not to misinterpret them in useless panoply, but to carry on for them in high adventure.

There are three types of monuments: those which have no value artistically or functionally; those which have beauty without utility and finally, those which deserve the name "living memorials," which contribute something to the welfare of mankind. Of the first type there are innumerable examples; the second, the beautiful memorials, do have some justification. But for him who suffered on the field of battle, what better memorial than a hospital or an endowed hospital bed or medical research project, or a medical center? Cancer and tuberculosis are greater foes of mankind than are military aggressors. For him who laid aside his books and his ambitions in connection with scholarly pursuits, what more fitting memorial than a perpetual scholarship in some institution of learning where youth generation after generation may join the quest of truth? For those who went out of a community where the opportunities for wholesome entertainment were restricted, a fine playground or a community hall would be splendid living memorials. A community hall open constantly for athletic games, symphony concerts, dances—a place which would counteract the degrading commercialized amusement so common in most cities; a crippled children's clinic; a church center such as the people of Coventry have planned; a music foundation. The list of living memorials is endless if we but give our minds and hearts to the task of realizing the possibilities of immortalizing our heroes.

Every college campus should have its memorial hall—not as a show place but as the center of some great intellectual enterprise conceived in the interest of humanity. This well might take the form of a Hall of World Affairs; where teachers and students of various nationalities and creeds, living and working together would seek through sound and realistic methods to develop international understandings and trust. Here lies the great hope of enduring peace—not in fantastic programs, not in wishful thinking of a Chamberlain at Munich but a united and far-reaching endeavor to think the whole tremendous problem through. Many times our academic interests have discouraged international good-will rather than promoted it.

You may recall that in the motion picture, Edison, the Man, Mr. Edison is the guest of honor at a banquet where the technical leaders pay their tribute to the great inventor and in his response he says, "To be told by the outstanding men and women of your time that you have contributed a great deal to human betterment is pleasant, very pleasant. I would hardly be human if my heart did not thrill with such a major compliment. But somehow I have not achieved the success I want. Earlier this evening I talked with two school children. Tomorrow the world will be theirs. It is a troubled world—full of doubt and uncertainty. You say we men of science have been helping it. Are those children and their children going to approve of what we have done? Or are they going to discover too late that science was trusted too much so that it has turned into a monster whose final triumph is man's own destruction?

"Some of us are beginning to feel that danger, but it can be avoided. I once had two dynamos. They needed regulating. It was a problem of balance and adjustment. And I feel that the confusion in the world today presents much the same problem. The dynamo of man's God-given ingenuity is running away with the dynamo of his equally God-given humanity. I am now too old to do much more than to say, 'Put those dynamos in balance. Make them work in harmony as the Great Designer intended they should.' It can be done. What man's mind can conceive, man's character can control. Man must learn that, and then we needn't be afraid of tomorrow, and man will go forward toward more light."

That institution which teaches its technical students to put the dynamo of man's God-given ingenuity in balance with the dynamo of his equally God-given humanity will indeed erect a magnificent memorial for those of its graduates who went down in the storm.

Pope Brock, a regent of the University of Georgia, recently said in his charter day address, "It is entirely possible to maintain an endurable social order with a modest amount of technology if there be present the necessary political, intellectual, and spiritual statesmanship. But if this statemanship be lacking, then all the technology, the genius man can create cannot save the world from anarchy. The question is not whether we shall abandon the teaching of the trades and technical skills but it is whether we shall first provide leadership without which the mastery of the vocations is a fruitless expenditure of effort."

Now, you may say that the subject of monuments is out of keeping with the spirit of baccalaureate Sunday. Monuments, however desirable, are after all erected in honor of those who have completed their lives, not for those who are beginning them. This is only partially true.

"All are architects of fate
Working on the walls of time,
Some with massive deeds and great,
Some with ornaments of rhyme."

From the day of his birth every individual builds his monument—some with stone, others with wood; hay; stubble. Day after day they grow. You see them going up all around you—if you have the eyes to see. Every man on the battle front is building his, with blood, sweat and tears, but no less is every man on the home front. For many it is a monument of self-denial; of eager participation in every enterprise which will help win the war, in willing cooperation in efforts to maintain and strengthen the institution in whose service they are; of readiness to withhold destructive criticism until all the evidence is in. For others it is an ugly monument, a monument upon which is inscribed in sharp relief the words, What do I get out of it? the monument of selfishness and pettiness, of evil communication. Will each of us be able to look at the monument he has built during the war with inner satisfaction, with certainty that he gave the best he had at all times to the end that victory might come surely and quickly? There are unhappy days ahead for those whose record is not what they would wish to show to the boys when they come home.

Thus in all the activities of our lives the monuments go up. That is why the subject of monuments is an appropriate theme for a baccalaureate sermon. That is why William Hazlitt said, "Those only deserve a monument who do not need one; that is those who have raised themselves a monument in the minds and memories of men."

We cannot beat the game. Our true monuments may be concealed for the moment but in the end the scaffolding comes down and there it is. The monument into which unworthy thought has gone will profit us nothing. A medieval prince, an atheist, laughed at the assertion of an ultimate resurrection. He built for himself a mausoleum, constructed of tremendously thick stone. "Now let God get my body on his resurrection day," he sneered. But a seed from a tree dropped into a small crack between the stones and in the years a sturdy oak pushed aside the slabs and made a great opening. We can't beat the game.

And, behold, a voice out of the cloud which said "This is my beloved Son, hear ye Him."

The voice from the clouds gives us the best instruction for monument building uttered through all time—"This is my beloved Son, hear ye Him." If you who are going out to meet life heed that injunction, the future will hold no terror for you.

The Pensions for Lame Duck New Deal Congressmen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, upon reading this article I wondered how many of the critics of Members of Congress at the time of the congressional-pension legislation will give vocal and written attention to the facts shown in this article. At that time the New Dealers, with their smear brigade, tried to blame Members of Congress that didn't even come under the act. This criticism was made even after the New Dealers had slipped the legislation through Congress and even after the President himself had signed the bill.

Although the President was to receive $37,000 a year for life and many Members of Congress had not been Members long enough to come under the provisions of the act, these New Deal smearers made every effort to use the legislation against the Members that didn't come under it, nor who were in any way responsible for slipping the legislation through in the first place.

These New Deal smearers formerly used the fortification of Guam, but since the New Dealers were forced to, and do, admit that there never was a Presidential request nor a bill to fortify Guam, they will have to think up a new smear.

The New Deal smear brigade may try to use the bobtail-ballot issue which is the same as the congressional pensions, since only Federal office seekers would be benefited. This may not be as good ammunition as they think.

Further if these New Deal lame-duck Congressmen that have attached themselves to the public pay roll through any appointive power and through a trick provision in the law, it is hoped that they will at least render some real public service.

There is no telling where this kind of a road would lead, nor how much the pension would increase, especially under the New Deal.

Elective officials should not come under a pension system or obtain civil-service status in order to get on the pay roll. Prospects of jobs on the Federal pay roll is a club no President should have over any one in the legislative branch of the Government. Such procedures are not conducive to realizing the aims of the Republic. The article follows:

F. D. USES TRICK LAW TO PENSION NEW DEALERS

(By Willard Edwards)

Lifetime pensions for a large group of lame duck New Deal Congressmen have been provided in the last 2 years through employment of President Roosevelt's appointive power and a trick provision in the law, Capitol Hill learned yesterday.

Congressional sources confirmed the existence of this hidden political weapon of the Roosevelt administration, which has been a closely guarded secret. One report was that 39 Democrats, ousted from Congress by the voters, have been thus rewarded.

The disclosure recalls the national furor over the retirement payments which the House voted itself on December 1, 1941, and then repealed by a vote of 387 to 7 on February 24, 1942, under the pressure of public opinion.

Despite that overwhelming rejection of pensions for Congress, there was left in the Civil Service Retirement Act a joker provision, it was learned, which has been used by the administration ever since to put New Deal Congressmen, repudiated by the voters, on the Federal pay roll for the remainder of their days.

ELECTED OFFICIALS EXEMPTED

Defeated Republicans also would be eligible for lifetime payments if they could secure a temporary administrative appointment from the New Deal. The secret system thus provides a political bludgeon of vast value in an election year, it was noted.

Elected officials are specifically exempted from retirement benefits under the law. The joker provision, however, states that if any person receives an administrative appointment, he may, upon leaving that post, apply for a pension and be credited for all the years of service previously rendered the Government if his salary was received from appropriated funds.

Thus, in the case of former Representative William L. Nelson, a Missouri Democrat, who served 18 years in the House before he was defeated in the 1942 elections, the system functioned in this manner:

Nelson came to Washington and secured an appointment as an assistant to War Food Administrator Marvin Jones. He served in this position for only 60 days, in October and November of 1943, then resigned and immediately applied for a pension. He received full credit for his 18 years of service in the House and went on the retirement pay roll at $150 a month in January of this year.

Efforts to secure the names of additional beneficiaries of the system were temporarily unsuccessful, although officials admitted there was a considerable number.

PENSION BASED ON $10,000

They also admitted that there is no statute of limitations on applicants and hinted that some Congressmen, ousted from office as long as 10 years ago, had recently learned of the New Deal scheme and qualified for pensions.

A lame duck could serve only one day in a humble government post, such as elevator operator or janitor, and then qualify for a pension for life, it was stated. Only Congressmen who have served at least 5 years are eligible, however, and the retirement age is 62.

Government employees are assessed 5 percent of their base pay throughout their years of service before they may qualify for retirement benefits. The secret system requires the lame ducks to pay 5 percent of whatever salary they receive during their 30 or 60-day administrative appointments, but their benefits are based upon the $10,000 salaries they received during their service in Congress.

The Late Honorable George W. Norris

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, there stands in this country a great and lasting monument to a great American. I refer to the T. V. A., for which full credit must go to the late Senator George W. Norris.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following newspaper editorial from the Huntsville (Ala.) Times, and the article by Marquis Childs appearing in the Washington Post on September 5, 1944:

[From the Huntsville (Ala.) Times]

GREAT PUBLIC SERVANT

Few public men have been so useful as ex-Senator George W. Norris, of Nebraska.

While still in the House of Representatives in 1910, he helped to break the power of the tyrannical Speaker, "Uncle Joe" Cannon.

During his 30 years in the Senate, he put through the law authorizing the Tennessee Valley Authority. Norris Dam, one of its most important links, rightly bears his name.

Almost single-handed, he added an amendment to the Federal Constitution. The twentieth, or lame-duck, amendment changed Presidential inauguration from the traditional March 4 to January 20, and required Congress to take office on January 3, less than 2 months after its election. Formerly a repudiated Congress could legislate from election day to March 4; its successor would not meet till the following December. A greater neglect of the popular will is hard to imagine.

Norris achieved in 1936 the surprising feat of reelection as an Independent candidate, beating both the Republican and Democratic nominees.

His defeat in 1942, when he attempted this again, was deplored even by many who did not share his views.

All in all, he might be called Nebraska's greatest gift to the Nation.

[From the Washington Post of September 5, 1944]

TRIBUTE TO GEORGE NORRIS

(By Marquis Childs)

We in America can be proud that George Norris was one of us. Even in this moment of world turmoil, his death makes a mark. It makes us pause and remember what he stood for.

It makes us think what the coming victory can mean if only we've learned just a little from the man who died out in McCook, Nebr., among his own people. That was one of the remarkable things about Norris. In all his years in Washington, he never lost touch with his origins.

He came from the humblest, plainest people. He grew up close to poverty, and he never forgot how wide the gulf is between the rich and powerful and the plain men and women of this earth.

Supporting his deepest convictions was his skill at the business of legislation. He had the know-how. There were good reasons why the correspondents in the Senate press gallery voted him the most useful Member of the Senate in 1941.

We saw him at work there on the Senate floor day after day, following with rare persistence the course of the legislative stream. He could be sentimental but never demagogic. His voice, rarely raised in oratory, carried the weight of knowledge and conviction.

Whenever you went to him you came away with a deep sense of the American past and the character that has come out of it. He walked always like a countryman, in solid, plodding steps that were the same in marble halls as in the furrows he'd plowed as a boy. His face looked as though it had been carved out of oak by one of those shrewd journeymen wood carvers who roamed New England and the frontier West.

When you first talked with him there was something between him and you—his reserve, his skepticism, a patient blankness that might have been self-protective. If he was self-protective, if he was very tired, as he often was, or if his melancholy sat heavily on him, his mood might not lighten. But ordinarily he came to life and his sweet, guileless smile shone out.

Shrewd men, quick-witted men, clever men seeking the prizes in the battle for power often were scornful of Norris. They called him a fake. They could not believe in his goodness. They thought he must be out for something for himself.

But he was not a fake. He was as selfless a man as this self-seeking time is likely to see. Out of his congressional salary he saved, after educating his children, hardly enough to keep him in his last years.

As far as monuments go, no one need worry about perpetuating Norris' fame. This Capitol is filled with marble cenotaphs and granite statues. But Norris has a living monument in the Tennessee Valley Authority, which was possibly the greatest achievement of his career.

If it had not been for his long, courageous fight at the end of the last war nothing like T. V. A. would have been possible. When he stood on the floor day after day to prevent Muscle Shoals from being given away—it would have amounted to that, so big were the stakes—the fight looked hopeless. That was at the beginning of the boom, when the magic of prosperity was to spiral into infinity.

Norris lived, however, to see his dream come true. Norris Dam, in the T. V. A. system, was named for him. He went down there and saw it in all the beauty of its setting.

But more than that, he lived to see the T. V. A. idea take hold on people's minds. Out in his own Missouri Valley Basin the demand is growing for a M. V. A. that will curb the floods, create power, attract industry, stop erosion. It would do, in other words, what T. V. A. has begun to do in the Tennessee Valley.

We're going to need Norris in the era we're coming into. We're going to need to remember his courage, his strength, patience, and persistence.

The Cry of the Tortured: Action!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of September 4, 1944:

THE CRY OF THE TORTURED: ACTION

(By Howard Fast, author of Citizen Tom Paine)

Will there be no end to this? In the name of God, will no one lift a voice? In the name of Christianity, will no one speak? Are there no voices left? Are we without anger? Without shame? Without mercy? Or have the Nazi beasts infected us with their own virus, so that we lend no ear to the shrieks of pain and turn our nostrils from the stench of a blood-soaked earth?

We have no excuses now. Our mighty armies stand on the borders of Germany. We have a voice to speak with, and behind that voice is the might of a righteous cause; but where we might roar with anger and action, we whisper and dawdle.

May God forgive us, for humanity may never forgive us. Safe on the walls of our churches are pictures of the Christ Child without number, but Christians stand silent while children by the thousands are led to the Nazi gas chambers. We have forgotten that He said: "Whosoever shall receive one of such children in My name receiveth Me."

May God forgive us what we have forgotten. We hear that 10,000,000 Christians and Jews have been murdered by the Nazis, and we are unmoved. We see photographs of the gas chambers wherein hundreds of thousands perished, and we are unmoved. We see the disinterred, broken bodies, piled like mountains of sorrow, and we are unmoved. We see the lists of the raped, the ravished, the tortured, and we are unmoved. We see such evil as this world never knew or dreamed of, and we are unmoved. We see the crematoriums, where the holy bodies of men, made in His image, were piled by the thousands and burned, and still we are unmoved. We stand face to face with the hordes of the anti-Christ, creatures of such evil as this world never knew, and still we are unmoved.

May God forgive us, for then the dead may. Their eyes are closed, but their voices are not silent. They accuse us, the fat, the smug, the contented and contemptuous—and we will not silence their voices with our own silence.

In the name of Christ, let us speak. Let us try to save those who live. Let us speak in words of anger and wrath, in words of fire. Let us speak through our Government, our statesmen, our newspapers, our radio, our churches.

With purpose to match hate, and with justice to match injustice.

Let us speak in a voice the Nazis will hear though they crawl to their deepest burrows. Let us speak in words they will never forget. Let us redeem ourselves as human beings, so that we may remember, without too much shame, that He said:

"Whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in My name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward. And whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in Me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea."

As a human service we urge you to write or wire your Congressman or your Senator to act now for a unified effort on our part and on the part of our allies to save what people may still be saved in the satellite nations.

He Wants Us To Forget

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, now that the President's campaign for a fourth term is in full swing, it is interesting to note the New Deal efforts to get the soldier vote and the use of the taxpayers' and bond buyers' money for political purposes.

Mr. Morris D. Ervin, correspondent for the Cincinnati Times-Star, recently told of eight Office of War Information publications being sent to the soldiers overseas. Seven of these items bore the imprint, "Published by the Government of the United States of America." The eighth was a four-color photograph on a handsome backing, bearing only the signature of the man pictured, "Franklin D. Roosevelt." Each of these publications contains a large picture of Roosevelt. Mr. Ervin says:

They are not samples of what was going to be done; they are samples of what was done.

These eight samples were from a shipment that was dumped on a pier by an Army transport with instructions to see that they were distributed among the soldiers on duty in that area.

Miliary censorship is such that I cannot tell you where the area is, but it can be said that it is one of the greatest assembly points for United States troops in the world.

And, how many of these samples were in that shipment? I cannot tell you how many, but I can tell you how much they weighed. They weighed 6,000 tons. That is quite a sizable bundle of propaganda.

The veterans remember that the first general law asked by Roosevelt in March 1933 was the so-called Economy Act, which took from many veterans all the benefits they were receiving and greatly reduced the amounts received by many others. They remember that in 1934 Congress voted to restore $103,000,000 of the $450,000,000 taken from the veterans by the Economy Act, and that President Roosevelt vetoed the bill. Congress passed it over his veto. In 1935 the President personally appeared before Congress to deliver his veto message on the veterans' bonus bill. His veto was overridden in the House, but was sustained in the Senate. In 1936 Congress passed another Adjusted Compensation Act. The President vetoed it, but his veto was overridden. In the Seventy-fourth Congress he vetoed four veteran measures. In the Seventy-fifth Congress he vetoed six veteran measures. And, during the depression he vetoed a bill to extend veterans' insurance policies. Congress overrode the veto and saved some 23,000 veterans from loss of their policies.

The President's change in attitude toward the veterans has come about since he became a candidate for the fourth term, and is seeking votes.

The President wants you to forget his failures in running the domestic affairs of the Government; the confusion, the chaos and turmoil, the bungling and mismanagement which have existed in all Government departments and agencies, even in the White House.

The most famous one was between Vice President WALLACE and Jesse Jones, in which each accused the other of practically everything that is bad, and eventually resulted in a directive from the President that the agencies should do their quarreling in private and the threat that if any more public statements of quarrels were made the persons involved would be immediately fired. Even this drastic order failed to stop the quarreling and bickering which has held back war production, as well as placing domestic affairs in a state of general confusion. The last within an agency explosion was the one which sent Donald Nelson on the same path traveled by WALLACE to China and will probably result in Nelson's demise, the same as it did in WALLACE'S, and sent Charles Wilson into private life.

Julius Krug, 36-year-old ardent new dealer, has been placed in charge of the War Production Board, and now the new dealers have complete control in plotting the vital problems of post-war reconversion.

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to contrast Senator TRUMAN'S present glowing tributes to the President and the New Deal with his statement about red tape, bureaucratic waste, and bungling in Washington. I quote Mr. TRUMAN:

Leadership is what we Americans are crying for. We aren't complacent. We are fighting mad. All we ask is that we be intelligently and resolutely led. I have pieced together an alarming picture of the threatened break-down of our war effort here at home. We owe it to ourselves to insist that the President act promptly to halt the selfish fights for power, the endless bickering and dissension, which have so far blocked the complete utilization of our productive energies.

Yes, Mr. TRUMAN; we are still crying to be "intelligently and resolutely led," and we are still asking the President "to halt the selfish fights for power, the endless bickering and dissension." This will only come about when Roosevelt is defeated and Dewey assumes the office of President in January 1945.

The President wants us to forget that waste, extravagance, and mismanagement have been the order of the day since March 1933.

The President wants us to forget the enormous sums wasted in the construction of Army, Navy, and Marine Corps camps and bases; for war plants and Federal Housing, under the cost-plus-fee system. Even 39,500 pounds of seed for the lawn, which was never even planted, were purchased and charged as part of the cost of construction at the Vigo Ordnance Works.

The President wants us to forget about Harry Hopkins, who is being kept out of the limelight, but who maintains his same position of influence in the New Deal.

It is noticeable that practically every prominent person, who was actively associated with the President's campaign for his first term, has either become so disgusted that they have resigned or have been deposed by the President, and now we find a situation where the "White House palace guard" of Harry Hopkins, Samuel Rosenman, Felix Frankfurter, Dave Niles, Ben Cohen, and others have replaced the real true Jeffersonian Democrats, and they have been determining the Government's policy. I doubt seriously if any of them could ever be elected by the people to any national office. Then we have Earl Browder, Harry Bridges, and Sidney Hillman taking control to manage the campaign for a fourth term, while National Chairman Hannegan and the big-city bosses, such as Hague, Kelley, and the old Pendergast machine, are playing the "me too" role. Undoubtedly the Communists think well of the President and must have some understanding with him when they went so far as to vote unanimously at their national convention not to put a Communist candidate in the field this year, but to give their support 100 percent to Mr. Roosevelt.

Sidney Hillman must have quite an influence with the President when the President left the choice of a Vice Presidential candidate to Hillman's judgment and required that the nominee must be approved by Hillman. Hillman has occupied very important positions under appointment by the President, and no doubt if the President is successful in November Hillman will be rewarded. Personally, I think Hillman is doing the cause of organized labor more harm than any other force in the country could do. Upon our statute books are many laws in the interest of the laboring man, but none of them were placed there by Hillman. All over the land many members of the C. I. O., good, honest, respectable, and loyal patriotic Americans, are resenting the attempt of Sidney Hillman to dictate to them how they must vote. They are free Americans, they are interested in the welfare of their Government, and they will make up their own minds how to vote, without dictation or coercion by Hillman or anyone else.

In my district a member of the C. I. O. visited Republican headquarters and contributed $5 to the Republican campaign fund, saying that he was for Dewey, but that he had been compelled to contribute $1 to Hillman's P. A. C., to be used to defeat Dewey, and he wished to contribute the $5 to help elect Dewey.

The President wants you to forget that the New Deal is giving to, spending, and lending almost twice as much money on our neighbors to the south as they spend out of their own treasuries on themselves; that the New Deal is paying for stocking streams and lakes of Venezuela with game fish; for a fish survey in the ocean adjacent to Panama; financing the preparation of collections of Latin-American Indians; for a survey of collections of Latin-American music; to record folk music in several of the countries; reconstructing the province of Oro in Ecuador; to purchase land on which to resettle farmers in South America; for building roads in El Salvador in a made work W. P. A. type of program; more than $2,000,000 given Equador for health and sanitation projects; over $750,000 to Guatemala; over $500,000 to Honduras. These twenty Central and South American countries in 1941 had a national budget totaling $1,067,000,000 and our country gave them more money than their total national budget.

The President wants you to forget such things as the sale of 40,000 batteries at Salt Lake City for $80, which were immediately resold for $20,000 by the purchaser; the sale of another 40,000 batteries for $50, which were resold by the purchaser for $7,200; that over 500,000 pounds of Argentine butter, purchased by the Commodity Credit Corporation and determined to be unsatisfactory for Government use was sold to the public for civilian use; the enormous quantity of white diaper cloth sent to the Arabs, which was used by them to make head dressings; that lend-lease money was used to send a symphony orchestra conductor, Eugene Ormandy, to Europe on a concert tour; the Detroit scandal where $1,721,000 worth of precious and scarce cutting tools were sold for $36,000; the hundreds of million dollars' worth of farm machinery sent to Europe and South American countries when our farmers were unable to secure farm machinery; that Government civil-service employment is over 3,000,000, with an annual pay roll of over $8,000,000,000 a year; that while no radio sets have been made for civilian use in the United States since April 1942, 14,000 sets were built last November and sent for civilian use to Europe under lend-lease; that the United States is the biggest publisher in the world, with magazines, pamphlets, and propaganda emanating from every Government agency; that the total Federal tax collected in 1933 was $2,080,000,000 which has been increased until now it is in excess of $41,000,000,000; that in spite of protests of a large number of Congressmen and of a large majority of American citizens, enormous quantities of scrap iron, oil, and gasoline were sold to Japan, with which to destroy China's liberty, and out of which scrap metal were cast the shells, bombs and bullets, and which oil and gasoline Japan used to defeat our forces at Pearl Harbor and at Bataan and Corregidor; about Myras Chaney and her rhythmic dancing; about John Bovingdon, the advocate of nudism in office, factory, and home; about the 3,565 Executive orders used to control and regulate our every action; about the dealings of the War Shipping Administration and the leasing of ships at unconscionable rates of profits to the owners—one example was a ship purchased in 1932 for $48,478 upon which the Government paid the owners a profit of $1,439,559 in rental.

The President wants you to forget about the enormous waste and destruction of food through careless handling and overpurchases; $150,000,000 invested in eggs alone, many of which have been totally destroyed and many sold for as low as 5 cents a case for hog feed—one shipment containing 120,000 dozen was shipped to various places over the country, until a freight bill of $4,200 had accumulated, and was completely spoiled and destroyed; over a million pounds of precious rationed cheese destroyed in Cincinnati, Ohio, and even now, Maine potatoes are being purchased in Maine for $60 per ton, shipped to sugar plants in Ohio, which have been idle because of the curtailment of the production of sugar beets, and now being utilized to make these Maine potatoes into cow feed, through a dehydrating process which requires 6½ tons of potatoes, $390 worth, to produce one ton of cow feed, which is sold for $18 per ton; in addition to the $390 paid for the potatoes, the Government pays the transportation charges to the plants in Ohio and all the labor costs, as well as the profit to the factory owners for the use of the factory.

He wants you to forget about the gasoline and oil consumed in transporting the First Lady of the land to various parts of the world; that on August 14, 1941, the candidate for Vice President, now known as the Missouri compromise, said that "the chief bottleneck which the defense program confronts is the lack of adequate organization and coordination in the administration of defense," and that the only place where the responsibility can be put is in the White House, and that "the summary and precipitate and arbitrary fashion in which priorities and curtailments are being administered is calculated to do infinitely more damage to the United States in the next 6 months than any external enemy possibly could do." Five million dollars were expended to expand the plant of the Marietta Manufacturing Co. and about $1,000,000 worth of tools and machinery installed. After this money was expended, not a single order was given the company. For this plant, a Federal housing project consisting of 450 houses was adopted, the houses constructed, but were never occupied. Finally many of them were loaded on barges and floated down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers to other locations.

The President would like for you to forget the impractical crackpots and so-called economists holding important positions in the various New Deal set-ups; the man who advised the farmers to remove the horses' shoes at night to conserve them; the man who advised the sheep raisers to postpone their lambing season; the man who advised the farmer to convert his Diesel tractor to burn coal when he applied for oil.

Many peculiar things are happening and frequently one Government agency is expending millions of dollars and devoting its entire energy to undo what another Government agency is spending millions of dollars and devoting its entire energy to do.

The O. P. A. has added between seven and eight hundred price-enforcing officials at $2,600 per year each, to keep food and other prices down, while the War Food Administration is spending millions to keep prices up. Through the War Food Administration, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Commodity Credit Corporation, the Government is spending more than a billion dollars a year to hold up the same commodity prices it is spending $155,000,000 a year to hold down.

The O. P. A. is certainly doing everything it can to put the small independent retailer out of business. It has classified retailers as class 1 and class 2, and here is an example of the way this classification works against the small independent businessman. Under the O. P. A. rules a class 2 retailer is compelled to pay $19.85 per dozen for overalls, which he must sell for $2.08 per pair, while the class 1 retailer is permitted to buy the same overalls for $16.70 per dozen, and must sell them for $1.55 per pair. In other words, the class 1 retailer sells the overalls for $1.25 per dozen less than the class 2 retailer must pay to purchase the overalls, thereby penalizing the customer 53 cents per pair for trading with the small merchant. Not only does this place the small-business man at a great disadvantage in selling overalls, it has a great tendency to destroy confidence in the small class 2 retailer, as it tends to make the general public believe that the class 2 retailer sells everything at the same relative higher price than the class 1 merchant.

The President has never made a sucess of anything; he has never had a successful business venture; he has never met a pay roll. While Governor of New York, he ran that State into an enormous debt, which has been paid off under Governor Dewey and that State now has over $40,000,000 for post-war work.

The American people sensed the danger of the New Deal, and in 1938 elected a greatly increased number of Republican Congressmen in the hopes that they would be able to stop many of the President's wild and unwarranted actions, but Congress has been only partially successful in this. And while the New Deal still has a majority in Congress, I predict that on November 7 the people will elect a Republican majority; then we will be able to do something about it.

The President has claimed and exercised vast powers which have not been delegated to him; but with an Attorney General who apparently advised the President he has the power to do whatever he wants to do, even to the point of seizing any private business, it can be readily seen that a majority in Congress is required to stop these unwise and unwarranted actions of the Chief Executive and his subordinates.

We shudder when we think of the enormous debt he has piled upon us. To give an idea of what a billion dollars is: If we should spend $1 every minute, it would require 1,902 years to spend a billion dollars. If we should spend a dollar every minute since the birth of Christ, we would have spent only $1,021,000,000.

Roosevelt has been the greatest spender of all times. He has increased our national debt over $200,000,000,000 and has piled taxes upon taxes, in his efforts to spend and spend, tax and tax, and elect and elect. In all the recorded history of the world, up to date, no human being has spent as much money as Roosevelt. The New Deal's inefficiency, lack of organization and spending policies have doubled the cost of the war. Senator BYRD attributes this to the New Deal policy of spending public money "on the assumption that money borrowed and spent is a means to promote prosperity" and that through "these spending policies every department of Government became inoculated with the germ of waste and extravagance. Those officials who could waste the most were rewarded by promotion and higher responsibilities. Those who attempted to economize were frowned upon and discouraged. When the necessity came for preparing this country for war, these same wasteful policies were carried into the war effort in a new field of greatly enlarged expenditures. This is the chief reason why this war is costing us very much more than it should."

The American people, realizing this, will elect Dewey and a Republican Congress, which will again establish constitutional government, and the checks and balances provided by our forbearers, which have made this Nation a great, free, prosperous Republic. People realize that it is their Representatives in Congress who have voted to protect the peoples' liberties and freedoms, and this new Republican President and Congress will work and cooperate in the post-war era to establish a lasting peace among the Nations of the World, and to again bring genuine prosperity and happiness to the American people.

Fifth Anniversary of Attack on Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me on September 1, 1944:

The beginning of the sixth year of the European War brings to our attention again the part that Poland has played in that struggle. She was the first country to be attacked by Hitler and she was the first country to resist Hitler's march.

After the fall of Czechoslovakia, Hitler made impossible demands upon Poland and if Poland had not resisted and if the nations of western Europe had not declared war on Hitler, it would have been an easy victory for him and the history of the last 5 years would have been different.

When Germany attacked Russia, Poland again became the battleground and Russia was finally able to defeat the German Armies after Stalingrad. Her armies came to Poland as liberators and considerable portions of Poland have been restored to their rightful owners, but as Germany retreats she burns, kills, and destroys.

With every town liberated from the Germans, stories of untold hardships and the most brutal murder come to be known.

We salute Poland on this fifth anniversary of the beginning of the World War and take our hats off to the gallant fighters whose resistance has made liberty possible.

Poland suffered not only from an attack by its enemies, but it suffered a martyrdom never before seen in the history of the world. Many communities were slaughtered to a man and thousands of Poles have been driven into slave labor in Germany.

Some Americans are now agitating for a negotiated peace with Germany and Japan. "Peace now," they plead. "Let us forgive and forget. Is there no pity in the world? Call back our armies, and let Hitler and Hirohito go on with their bloody work."

In such thought is the very reason why it was possible for Hitler and Hirohito to launch their adventures in destruction.

It was just because our people did not realize in the years before the war that militarism cannot be left unguarded, that it has become necessary for us to pour out our blood and treasure into this fight for the preservation of the world as we know it.

Aggression feeds on itself, and all successful conquerors do not know when to stop.

The press has given us within the last week a most gruesome picture of the most horrible destruction which has ever been the lot of mankind. The scenes described by neutral correspondents who have witnessed German cruelties and massacres cannot be questioned as to their veracity and accuracy.

On the outskirts of Lublin, in Poland, the Germans have established a mass-murder factory. Here they herded together men, women, children, and even babies, from 22 different countries, and in cold blood massacred almost 2,000,000 people.

With a fiendish love of cruelty and murder, they used modern scientific apparatus for the sole purpose of carnage. By the use of electric devices, lethal gas, poison gas, and the most refined instruments of cruel torture, they put an end to 2,000,000 useful lives, simply so as to see the deaths of people they could not control, and who were potential members of a community which the Nazis did not want. They wanted their own race, and no other in Europe.

In the guise of seeking to establish a great Reich, the Lebens-raum for all, they tried to make it impossible for any other nation to remain in existence besides the "herrenvolk."

Now, would it be fair for us to forgive Hitler for his insane plunder, murder, rape, and enslavement of millions of innocent people? Can we just forget what this monster did, and say "All right, boys, go on, you are forgiven—not guilty, but don't do it again?" Of course not. The world cannot be so callous and indifferent. To do so would result in more slaughter and more destruction. It would mean that generations yet to be born would be sacrificed to Hitler's ruthlessness or the ruthlessness of his successors in future years.

No; we must demonstrate in no uncertain terms that crime does not pay, and just as we cannot allow a crime in civil life to go unpunished, we must not permit this adventure of destruction to go on.

If we do that, we might as well free and forgive our own criminals in this country. Open all our prisons and asylums for the criminally insane. Free all the murderers, rapists, arsonists, degenerates, forgers, thieves, adulterers, homosexualists, rabble-rousers, inciters of race and religious hatred, depraved sexual maniacs.

No; we must exact full justice and retribution upon the disturbers of the peace. If peace is to come to us again, it must be based on justice, and it must be based on the first freedom, which President Roosevelt proclaimed to the world, freedom from fear.

We must not allow fear to come into the lives of future generations. They must be allowed to live without ever being disturbed by a war of extermination.

Platform of the Affiliated Young Democrats, Inc., of New York State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following platform of the Affiliated Young Democrats, Inc., of New York State, adopted at the sixth biennial State convention held at the Hotel Piccadilly, New York City, on Saturday, July 15, 1944:

We, the Affiliated Young Democrats of New York State, declare our complete and unbounded faith in the accomplishments of the national and international leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt. His continued leadership is necessary to assure early victory and the return of our soldiers and war-workers to profitable peacetime employment.

We hail the democratic strength of his voice in the ranks of the United Nations. We are proud of the inspiration, and hope, and direct help that this great American has given to millions long oppressed by dictatorship, and to millions more with whom our people join to march and fight in today's struggle for world freedom.

This war to which our Nation has given its young life and its boundless energy will not end when fighting ceases on the battle-front. Victory for freedom on the field must be followed by the triumph of democracy and world cooperation at the peace conference. The continued leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt so effective in uniting our people in America's great and total war effort, which is so formidable in shaping the principles and practices of the United Nations' winning fight against the Axis is essential to complete victory in the war, and in the peace. We are convinced that Republican leadership which restrained preparation for the defense of democracy, cannot be trusted to handle the great post-war task of rendering democracy secure. The mistake of 1920 must not be repeated. America must never again retreat to the shallow shell of isolationism.

Our faith in the President's leadership in these unparalleled world crises of victory and peace is based upon these achievements:

The problems of winning the war have been largely solved by the extraordinary success of the Democratic administration in the greatest industrial and military mobilization in history. The same administration which was forehanded in preparing the Nation for war is the surest hope of sound preparation for a stable and peaceful post-war world in which all peoples can work together for a fuller life.

The cooperation reached by the President with the governments of our fighting allies are future cooperation, vital to a lasting peace, can only be attained by leaders of understanding and experience who have been tested, trained, and proved in action.

The preservation of home-front democracy in the face of war's inexorable and merciless demands. No people of any warring nation today enjoy as much wartime democracy as we Americans have maintained. Despite the sweeping emergency powers available to him, our Commander in Chief has chosen the harder road of democracy in his wartime leadership of our people.

Our Nation has built an armed force of terrible striking power supported by a volume of war production of miraculous proportions under the direction of the Roosevelt administration.

To the end of gaining an endurable and lasting peace among the nations of this world, we pledge ourselves to the following objectives:

1. The continued leadership of our great Commander in Chief, Franklin D. Roosevelt, supported by a cooperative Democratic majority in Congress. He has guided the country through the worst world depression in history without sacrificing the principles of democracy. He has piloted the country through the anxious pre-war years with a foresight and vision that kept alive the aspirations of all free men. Under his leadership America has become not only the "arsenal of democracy" in a material sense but also the spiritual stronghold of democracy of the future.

2. All measures required to assure early victory of the United Nations over the forces which have sought to destroy democracy and enslave the world under dictatorship by unconditional surrender of the Axis Powers.

3. Immediate establishment of an effective world federation of nations dedicated to the maintenance of world peace and guaranteeing enjoyment of the "four freedoms" by all. We condemn the new mask of isolationism which is based on a jealous regard for so-called national sovereignty. We opposed a system of military alliances as a false substitute for world cooperation. We censure the economic imperialism which would preserve broad regions as raw-material producers for more favored peoples.

4. Continuation of the country's armed might until such time as the readiness of all nations to participate in effective world federation has been fully demonstrated. This should include maintenance of a strong army, navy, and air force, and military training as a part of full educational opportunity for all youth.

5. Measures to carry out the pledge jointly entered into by all countries participating in the international labor conference. This would provide that workers and productive resources shall not remain idle while the needs of large parts of the world remain unsatisfied. It will dispel the fear of want from our own and all people through expansion of the exchange and consumption of goods and the liberation of economic activity from unreasonable restrictions. It will emphasize the interdependence of nations and the need for their collaboration to achieve these objectives.

6. Immediate adoption of a comprehensive reconversion plan from war to peace production which will assure a cushioning of the economic shock to workers and management, protection to small industry, protection of the public's investment in Government war plants, proper use and distribution of war surpluses. This plan should adequately represent the interests of management, labor, farmers, consumers, and producers.

This reconversion program should also include:

(a) For veterans: Orderly demobilization with continuance and expansion of present measures aimed at fair assistance to returning war veterans. Such a program calls for adequate discharge pay, rehabilitation of the disabled including physical and occupational therapy, special machinery for job placement, resumption of education interrupted by the war, vocational training; farm opportunities in connection with restoration of lands acquired for military purposes and new agricultural lands created by reclamation projects. We advocate maintaining and expanding services for adequate and dignified aid to the dependent family members of Americans who give their lives in today's war for freedom.

(b) For war workers: Unemployment compensation with a maximum rate of at least $25 a week for a period sufficient to absorb individual economic fluctuations due to mass conversions; extension of coverage to include Federal industrial workers; provision for transportation of war workers back to their homes or chosen places of employment; guidance and retraining of war workers to assure the best permanent distribution of industry in a balanced economy.

(c) For the country as a whole: An orderly program of construction projects, fully engineered, to fill the valley of unemployment through creating a demand for men and materials; stimulation of a home-building program; provision for extension of credit, where needed, particularly to encourage the early conversion to peacetime activity of small competitive business which still is responsible for the bulk of employment; progressive elimination of controls tending to restrict new enterprise. A sound post-war tax program with taxes lowered sufficiently to meet the post-war economic status of the individual taxpayer but kept high enough on individuals and corporations able to pay to sustain Government solvency and to assure regular reduction of the public debt.

(7) Measures to safeguard the country against inflation through carefully worked out continuation, during the reconversion period, of Government controls over prices, rents, wages, and to the extent required, rationing of supplies, so administered as to assure the gradual relaxation of controls as full peacetime production is attained. These measures should also include principles of taxation designed to maintain business activity and consuming power at high levels, to encourage equity as against debt investment, and to provide for orderly retirement of the national debt without accentuating swings in the economic cycle.

8. Measures to eliminate the restrictive influence of monopoly upon the ability of the country to utilize fully its vast resources. These should include:

(a) Removal of discrimination in financing, transportation charges, and other economic factors tending to restrict the development of any region or enterprise.

(b) Release of scientific and technical advances from the domination of monopoly, whether domestic or embodied in international pools or cartels, in order that inventions may serve the general welfare.

(c) Extension of the principle embodied in government lending agencies to regulate the flow of capital funds in the interest of maximum production and economic stability. Credit and financing should be available to all productive enterprise and, at low interest rates, to noncommercial public developments.

(d) Retention by the Government of industrial plants constructed for war purposes, with provision for their utilization by the Government, or under lease to private, cooperative, or public agencies to the extent necessary and subject to such conditions as may be required to assure full production of necessary commodities at the lowest possible prices.

(e) Encouragement of cooperative enterprise to preserve the force of competition and assure social responsibility in the conduct of business.

(f) Continuation and strengthening of the Securities Exchange Commission as protection to the public against stock manipulation and the evils of widespread speculation.

9. Extension of the principles of the Reciprocal Trade Treaties so successfully conceived and negotiated by Secretary of State Cordell Hull. We urge the breaking up and future abolition of privately owned world trade and industrial combines, secret agreements and cartels. Progressive elimination of all trade and other barriers to economic cooperation among nations, in order that ultimate equality in the use of the world's resources may preserve peace and assure a high standard of living of all peoples.

10. Federal measures to maintain full operation of the construction industry through public-works and home-building programs carefully adjusted to compensate for the swings in private investment. This program should include:

(a) The planned development of the country's river basin resources in general accordance with the principles embodied in the T. V. A. Act. This would provide regional authorities, directed to cooperate with State and local interests, with unitary responsibility for the planning, construction, and operation of projects for navigation, flood control, irrigation, soil conservation, hydroelectric power, and other beneficial purposes.

(b) Early authorization and construction of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway and Power project in accordance with the bill now before Congress which provides for agreement with the State of New York for ownership and operation of the power development on the American side of the river by the Power Authority of the State of New York.

(c) A national program designed to assure modern, healthful, and attractive homes to all.

11. Measures to assure labor that its hard-won right to participate through collective bargaining in the industries which mean its livelihood shall not be curtailed in the post-war era but shall be extended to embrace a genuine partnership status in industry. There must be no open-shop movement to destroy organized labor such as characterized the Republican era following the First World War. Specifically, we favor:

(a) Continuation of the National Labor Relations Act, unweakened by amendments designed to restrict its application or narrow its scope. The act should be broadened to include agricultural labor in those divisions of agriculture which are engaged in large-scale production or which have been organized into cooperative producers' associations.

(b) Continuation and improvement of legislation designed to assure all labor fair and decent working conditions, including reasonable hours and a living wage. Such legislation should be administered by officials fully cognizant of its historical background and sympathetic with the broad purposes which it is intended to achieve.

(c) Continuation of the National War Labor Board, without restrictive or procedural amendments, during the reconversion period, with a gradual merging of the advisory phases of its dispute-settling function into the National Labor Relations Board after the termination of the emergency.

(d) Immediate post-war repeal of coercive and restrictive portions of the Smith-Connally Act and recognition of labor's rights to strike as the ultimate economic safeguard for all its normal peacetime rights.

(e) Increasing recognition of organized labor as an essential partner in an industrial society and provision for its participation in all phases of government.

(f) Strengthening of the United States Employment Service and its operation on a country-wide basis to assure the soundest possible distribution of labor in the interest of employment stability.

12. Expansion of the social-security program to provide full protection against old age, illness, and economic misfortune for everyone, with benefits adequate to provide a minimum of health and decency, regardless of previous earnings. The program should assure complete medical care for all and should allow no child under any circumstances to want good food, adequate clothing, a decent home, and the opportunity for education. We favor:

(a) Prompt enactment of the Wagner-Murray bill.

(b) Extension of coverage of the Social Security Act to vast segments of the population not now covered.

(c) Greater cooperation of the Federal Government with State plans in order that the national economy, which affects and is affected by local and sectional conditions, may afford reasonable support to State and local activities.

(d) Careful study of existing legislation and enactment of additional legislation to close tax loopholes available to large business enterprises and insure placing the burden of taxation where Congress intended it to rest.

13. Measures to assure farmers equality of bargaining power with other organized interests which effect the balance of our economic system. These measures should include provisions which will assure to all farmers ample markets for farm products, no unwarranted intermediate costs between what the farmer gets and what the consumer pays, low interest rates and low prices on the machinery and supplies required for farm operation, good roads, good schools, and rural electrification at rates which will make electricity available in abundance to all. They will be based on recognition of the mutual interest of farmers and industrial workers in high living standards and economic stability as the best assurance of an ample market for their respective products.

Never again should it be necessary to curtail farm production because a large portion of the population cannot afford an adequate diet.

14. Measures to encourage the development of balanced rural-industrial communities, with a high economic and cultural level throughout the country, in order to assure a healthy and stable distribution of population and wealth in the closest possible association with the land which is the source of our spiritual strength.

15. Legislation extending the privilege of voting to all over 18 years of age. Those old enough to fight should share in the determination of governmental policies which vitally affect their lives.

16. Legislation required to end the blot on democracy's shield due to the existence of discrimination in political, social, or economic opportunity based on race or religion. We approve of measures designed to achieve greater fairness to all races in the United States. We advocate repeal of poll taxes, a Federal antilynching bill, and continuance of the Fair Employment Practices Commission.

We, the Affiliated Young Democrats of New York, earnestly believe that measures designed broadly to meet these purposes are essential elements to the winning of the war, and the post-war effort to preserve a vital democracy and permit the traditional American way of life to flow on as a mighty stream into the future. Protection of the individual rights affirmed in the Declaration of Independence can only be assured through the achievement of economic as well as political democracy. We believe it to be the will of the American people to control their own destiny and forever retain their freedom to think, and speak, and to be free from fear and want, and to worship God.

Freedom From Fear

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD J. McMURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. McMURRAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including a speech entitled "Freedom From Fear" which I delivered at a win-the-peace rally, Carnegie Hall, New York City, September 12, 1943.

This speech was subsequently printed in Vital Speeches of the Day on November 15, 1943:

FREEDOM FROM FEAR—REMOVE THE ROOT CAUSE OF WAR

(By HOWARD J. McMURRAY, Congressman from Wisconsin, delivered at a win-the-peace rally, Carnegie Hall, New York City, September 12, 1943)

We live in a world which is doomed to more or less continuous conflict until we the people of the United States and, I might add, the people of the rest of the world begin to understand the basic causes of war. War is the great devastating disease of modern civilization. It is a cancer on the body politic, which, if not cured, will destroy all those values which we have developed and learned to hold dear throughout the period of the past 2,000 years. The causes of war are, of course, many, but all these causes may be cataloged under one of three general headings. Each explanation, naturally, is given in many ways and has many advocates. It is my contention that we have war because we have refused to study and to understand the real causes and to do what is essential to remove the germs which create the disease. If we treat the wrong disease, the patient will not be cured, and if we fail to diagnose the disease correctly, the patient will certainly be destroyed. It is imperative to seek out the root cause of war in our world and to do what is necessary in order that our children and our children's chilren shall not be inevitably doomed to mass conflict more frightful and destructive than that through which we are now passing.

The first general theory of war may be stated briefly in the following terms: War is natural; it results from the fact that man is greedy, selfish, pugnacious, and brutal. You have heard this theory expressed in different ways at different times. Some say, "We have always had war and will always have war." Others say, "As long as man's nature is what it is, we will fight." I call this the original-sin doctrine of war, a doctrine which says war is inherent and natural in man. These are different ways, of course, of saying that the causes of war are primarily psychological and man being what he is, nothing can be done about it. Let us examine this theory and these statements. Will anyone contend, if he will take a careful look at his world, that war is simply the result of the nature of man? Is it not evident that all kinds of people live all over the world? There are good people and bad people in the city of New York, but they do not resolve their differences by the use of violence. There are good people and bad people in the State of New York, but they do not fight each other. There are good people and bad people in the United States of America, but force is not used between them. There are good people and bad people within the confines of the political boundaries of every nation-state on earth and yet within these boundaries, differences which arise between men are not resolved violently. This devil theory of war simply is not adequate to explain war as we have it in the modern world. War is not simply and primarily a result of the nature of man. It is not primarily psychological; it is not a result of the simple fact that some people are good and some people are bad. Even in the midst of this great conflict, we know and can admit that all of the people with horns are not confined within the political boundaries of certain nation-states and all of the people with wings are not confined within the boundaries of certain other nation-states. We must, therefore, rule out as the foundamental cause of modern mass conflict the theory that war is natural and that its causes are innate in man. I do not, of course, deny that there is room for improvement in man's nature. If we all lived by the Golden Rule, there would be no war, nor would there be need for any of the institutions of social control which are present in all organized society. You would not have any government because you would not need it; nor would you have churches, or schools, because you would not need them. Our world, however, is a very human one. It is full of a great many things of which we disapprove. Yet, the individual greed and the individual avarice of the average person is not the major cause of violence in those parts of the world which we call civilized. We know perfectly well, for instance, that the violence which we have in the world today is something different and springs essentially from a different root than the original sin of man. We have learned to control man within the organized political societies which men have built.

The second general explanation for war is economic, and it is my intention to show you that both phases of this theory are essentially false when used to explain war as an institution in modern society. The first part of this argument goes something like this—you have heard it many times and many of you have believed it: Stated simply this theory explains war as the result of the maldistribution of economic goods and services. It is most often stated in the following terms: As long as there are "have" and "have not" people on earth, you will have war. This is evidently not true. There are "have" and "have not" people in the city of New York, in the State of New York, in every State of the Union. There are rich and poor people in the United States of America and in every other nation-state on earth. Yet within the city of New York, the State of New York, and every politically organized society on earth, war has been abolished. Just as I admit that man's nature may be and ought to be improved, I make no plea for, nor do I justify the present maldistribution of economic goods among men. I happen to be one of those who believes that a better distribution of income and wealth is imperative and that we should take all reasonable steps to this end. I know, and you know, however, that this maldistribution, as vicious as it is, is not the primary cause of war in our world.

The second part of the economic explanation of war is the so-called Marxian theory which says in essence this: War is the result primarily of the capitalistic organization of economic society. There is a tendency, so this theory goes, for capitalism, as it matures, to develop into monopolies—huge concentrations of economic power which tend to use the political state for their own purposes—and in the competition engendered between the capitalists of one part of the world and the capitalists of another part of the world the root cause of war may be found. One does not need to deny that there are tendencies within nations for wealth to become concentrated within fewer and fewer hands, nor need one deny that this economic power is used to control the policies of government in some cases.

Yet war as we have it in our modern world cannot be blamed primarily on capitalism or on any other form of economic organization known to and used by modern man. War is not a result of economic competition as such. The capitalists of New York and the capitalists of Philadelphia are much more competitive, have many more conflicts of interests than the capitalists of New York and the capitalists of Berlin. Yet New York and Philadelphia have never gone to war with each other. Twice within our generation New York and Berlin have fought. That conflicts of economic interest are present cannot be denied. But these conflicts of interest are not in themselves the fundamental cause of war. The capitalists within the confines of the political boundaries of modern nation-states may compete vigorously and sometimes even viciously, but they do not fight each other. It is only when these conflicts of interest cut across the boundaries of nation-states that war is engendered. People who accept the simple Marxian theory as the primary explanation of war will perhaps have trouble in explaining the fact that the two countries in this present war which have fought each other most bitterly are neither of them capitalistic in their economic organization. Russia is not a capitalistic state nor is Germany a capitalistic state. I do not see how one can blame capitalism for war in this particular case.

There is one thing that is natural about war, as it is natural about almost all forms of human activity. There are conflicts of interest between people when people come into contact one with the other. These conflicts may be economic or social or racial or ideological or of any other origin. Men do differ about things and ideas. When two men want the same wife, or the same job, or the same piece of property, or the same raw material, or the same markets, they have conflicts of interest about these things. It is easy to understand, however, that these conflicts, no matter how serious, do not lead to war except under certain conditions. I submit it is these certain conditions, which I am about to explain, that constitute the primary and fundamental cause of mass conflict in modern society.

If war is not psychological primarily in its origin, or is not economic primarily in its origin, it must be political. War is essentially a result of anarchy, and anarchy is a lack of government. Where men's interests conflict within organized political society, these conflicts are resolved by methods short of war. If we understand war and peace, we can learn how to keep the peace. Peace is not just an absence of conflict; it is a planned way of living among men. All the peace that man has known has been a creation of man's effort, and man has been able to keep the peace because he has been willing and able to dream dreams and to make those dreams come true, to set up institutions to perform certain functions and those certain functions are always performed by all governments in all societies. Peace has been achieved when men organized political systems and substituted reason and justice for force in the settlement of differences which naturally arise among them. Let me repeat, peace is a planned way of living, it is a creation of man. It is a result of the institutions built by man. Men have peace when they substitute law for force in settling their differences. Peace is, therefore, a result of law, and law is a result of government. There can be, let me repeat, no peace in this world of ours without law, and there can be no law without government.

The functions of government are relatively easy to understand. First, there is the problem of making the rules by which men live and of changing these rules when conditions change. This we call the legislative function. You are all quite familiar with it. Then there is the function, or problem, of enforcing the rules by which we live. This is the executive or administrative function. There is also the function of interpreting the rules in their application to individuals and groups of individuals where conflicts arise under the rules. This is the judicial function. Where man has built government to perform these functions, and where he has put the concentrated force of the community behind the law instead of behind the litigants, he has found peace. Peace is, therefore, the result of the monopolization and centralization of the right to use force. One of my great teachers used to define sovereignty as the monopolization of violence by politicians. Although sovereignty may have other characteristics, this is certainly true about it. In a politically organized community the state alone may legally use violence or force. Individuals and groups of individuals within the politically organized state have given up their right to use violence in order to enforce their wills. The right to use violence has been monopolized and this monopolized violence is placed behind the rules by which men live and not behind the men who have conflicts of interest one with the other. In the city of New York this monopoly of violence is the police department. In the United States of America it is represented by the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

It is trite to state that our world is interdependent. Our world is one, and we ought to realize that even Hitler and his advisers know this. They know that the world is going to be ruled from a common center. They know that the differences which arise between peoples from the four corners of the globe must be settled under common rules. This war is not being fought to unify the world; it is being fought, rather, between those who want to unify it on a master-slave basis and those who think that it must be unified on the principle of democratic consent. War cannot be eradicated unless we build a government which has power coextensive with the needs of modern industrial man. Modern industry draws its materials and sends its products throughout the world, and unless we substitute law for violence in the settlement of the conflicts of interest which inevitably arise, we are doomed to perpetual warfare.

Let us look briefly at the historical evolution of political societies. There was a time on earth when among our ancestors the family was the basic and only existing unit of social organization. In those days, war, if you want to use that word, or battle, or violence was continuous when families came into contact one with the other. There was violence because there were conflicts of interest, and there was no organization to substitute reason and law for the use of force in settling these differences. Gradually, however, families coalesced into clans. After this happened, we find peace within the clan, and war between the clans whenever there was conflict of interest. Clans coalesced into tribes, and there was peace within the tribe and war between the tribes. Then at different stages and at different times in various parts of the world there developed a series of political institutions—the city-state, the feudal manor, right down to the modern nation-state. And this has always been true; within the organization that possesses political sovereignty there has been peace, and between the sovereign political groups there has often been war.

You live in a world, internationally speaking, that is anarchy, tempered only by diplomacy, alliance, and a few occasional and feeble attempts at confederation. This is your present-day world; a world so interdependent economically that men within the confines of the United States can perform acts, official Government acts for instance, the results of which may be to thrown thousands of people out of employment in countries half way around the world. Our political system is so organized that we are responsible for our acts only within the boundaries of our sovereign nation-state. Our acts, however, affect people in far-away places, and there are inevitable conflicts of interest resulting which, if not solved by means of law, may easily bring about a condition where violence is used. Let me repeat, man has peace only when he builds for peace and when he creates institutions which will keep the peace. You cannot find any exception to this in history.

Twenty-five years ago, another professor of political science turned politician told the world what it was going to have to face within that generation. We called him an idealist and a dreamer, an impractical college professor, and a great many other names. The American people turned back to another group of political leaders—"back to normalcy"—wonderful words. And when our people did this, the same college professor told us what would happen to this world. He predicted the kind of world which we would have if we did not do certain things. He warned us of what was to come. We have that world today. We are living in it, although we do not find it comfortable. I want to point out to you tonight that Woodrow Wilson was the great realist of his time; the impractical dreamers were on the other side of the fence.

Let me repeat again, we have the techniques; we know how to do this; we have the knowledge and the experience. Wishful thinking will not save us. It is only by doing and acting in an intelligent manner that the problems of our day may be solved and that we may make ourselves fit for survival. This is the great question of our time; the great debate of our generation. It is not dreamstuff; it is not utopia; it is not a question to be faced sometime in the distant future. It is the critical decision which our generation must make.

Pattern for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Chicago Sun of Monday, August 21, 1944:

PATTERN FOR PEACE

PART I. REALISM IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

(By the Most Reverend Samuel A. Stritch, Archbishop of Chicago)

Unfortunately the word "realism" when it refers to international settlements, frequently is used as a synonym for compromise with moral principle. In its name strong nations are permitted to violate the sovereignty, independence, and integrity of weak nations, imperialistic protectorates are set up under the guise of spheres of influence, aggressions are sanctioned under the plea of military necessity or the need of breathing spaces, the seeds of discontent which germinate into wars are sown.

There are those who, concentrating on the failures of the past, assert that it is useless to expect in this world of men a peace based on moral principles. They say that the wise statesman will accept unjust compromises as practical necessities and give his thought to getting from them advantages for his own country. The idealist, they say, in international affairs is stupid and an impractical dreamer.

This sort of thinking assumes that man is incapable in the affairs of life to achieve justice. It is a surrender, a tragic surrender, and is nothing more than cowardly defeatism.

Its consequences are disastrous militarisms, wasteful armament economies, the paralyzing of genuine progress, and periodic world wars. Reason rebels against it.

We know that it is within the power and ability of man to avoid these catastrophic world wars which are exhausting the resources of the nations, bringing suffering and anguish to millions and millions of homes, halting the progress of civilization and disgracing human history. Man can discover the way to a genuine world peace and strong men can travel this way.

It is evident that if there is to be a genuine world peace it must be founded on moral principles. When civil governments were not able to protect their rights, the citizens were forced to arm themselves and defend their rights by force.

Against this unhappy condition they rebelled and set up strong governments, that under law they might enjoy their freedoms.

In the family of nations there must come the reign of law. Already much has been done in the field of international law, but it is patent that much remains to be done before might will become the instrument of law.

During the period following the last World War, the nations entered into many agreements, signed very many treaties, and tried the experiment of the League of Nations. They failed to preserve the peace and to solve pressing international problems. What was the cause of this failure?

Certainly an important cause was their neglect in making the moral law the preamble to international law. You cannot have law without justice, and justice is a moral thing.

They considered national sovereignty to be outside the moral law and tried to settle international problems on the basis of expediency. There were other causes for the breakdown of international relations, but certain it is that disregard of the moral law was at the root of it. In the countries where dictators seized the political power, law was disregarded precisely because the moral law was contemned. The way to world peace is the establishment of the reign of law in the family of nations.

There is a sane realism in international relations, and that is the realism which recognizes moral realities.

Never can a genuine peace be based on a compromise with justice.

It may seem a little thing to permit a great strong nation to violate the independence and integrity of a small weak nation, but history proves that from such violations there have come great wars. When Hitler began his series of aggressions, they were aggressions against small weak nations.

No amount of cajolery or force is able to calm the discontent which comes from violation of rights.

It may be pictured to the injured nation that helpful economic opportunities will be derived from assent to such violation, that there will be given it greater security under the power of the mighty nation, that many benefits will accrue to it, but in that nation there will be the determination to regain its freedom, and against the unjust aggressor it will not fail to use all its resources.

This is history. Injustice begets war, and we know that war in our times is not an isolated happening and that easily it involves all the nations.

The very horror of war in modern times spurs men on to find the way to establish world peace. Every advance toward the perfecting and the strengthening of international law leads to world peace.

But we must keep in mind that international law, which is made up only of international agreements and treaties, is ineffective. World peace will come when the nations recognize the moral law as the preamble to all international law.

This moral law is not of their making. It binds them just as it binds individuals. For them it is an imperative which may not be disregarded without inviting catastrophes. The first advance to world peace is to face the realities of the moral law.

The Senate's Treaty Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of Tuesday, September 5, 1944, entitled "The Senate's Treaty Power," which has reference to a very timely and interesting article by Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University and president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, entitled "The Hope of the World":

[From the New York Times of September 5, 1944]

THE SENATE'S TREATY POWER

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, as president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace has added his voice to those who are advocating an amendment to the Federal Constitution to provide for ratification of treaties by a majority vote in each of the two Houses of Congress instead of by a two-thirds vote of the Senate alone. The present requirement, as Dr. Butler points out, "might easily lead to almost irreparable damage to the prosperity and happiness of the American people as well as to the great movement of international cooperation to establish and maintain world peace."

There can be little doubt that, if the Senate itself took the initiative in proposing such an amendment, it would be immediately endorsed in the House and endorsed overwhelmingly by the country. The Senate alone has stood in the way of this change. It is understandable that when a small body of men holds the great power that a Senate minority now does, it should be reluctant to give it up or to share it. Many Senators doubtless quite sincerely feel that retention of the present system is in the best interests of the country, even though a majority of their fellow-citizens do not share this feeling. But the Senators would do well to ask themselves seriously whether, even from the narrow standpoint of the interest of the Senate alone, it is wise for that body to try to retain its present treaty power in its present form.

Let us suppose that a treaty or a group of treaties is submitted that two-thirds or even a majority of the Senate feels that it cannot conscientiously accept. If such a treaty were submitted to the full Congress and rejected by a majority in both houses, the country would no doubt accept this result as a reflection of its own majority opinion. But a much different situation would exist if the Senate alone, by failure to obtain a two-thirds vote, rejected such a treaty. Especially if a majority vote of the Senate favored the treaty, it would be pointed out that once more a minority had prevented the majority of the country from making the kind of peace it wanted. There would certainly follow proposals, with a great measure of public opinion behind them, to bypass the Senate and hence Congress altogether in future treaties. However unwise that public opinion might be, if the Senate had public opinion strongly enough against it, it would be sure to find itself effectively by-passed altogether by one method or another.

The Senate will be following its own self-interest as well as the interest of the whole country if it takes the initiative in removing the two-thirds requirement and in sharing its great treaty responsibility with the House.

THE HOPE OF THE WORLD

(By Nicholas Murray Butler)

The citizens of our Nation, which is of outstanding influence in the political, economic, and intellectual life of the world, are about to choose the head of the executive department of their Federal Government. Apart from the vast number of those who will participate in making this choice, the method of the choice is itself quite unique. Ever since the democratic principle gained power in Europe, it has been customary to have the administrative head of a government chosen either by the legislative branch of that government or by the ruling monarch with the approval and support of the legislative branch. The term of service of the head of a government so chosen and the policies which he supported and followed have been, in fact, controlled by the legislature whether called a parliament or by some other name. In the United States, however, the President is chosen for a definite term by the people and is responsible to them. The system of choosing presidential electors long since became a mere formality, and these electors have for many years simply recorded the declared preferences of those citizens who had elected them. In the United States, the relationship between the President and the Congress, between the executive and the legislative branch of the Federal Government, is one of independent cooperation. The authority, the duties, and the responsibilities of each are clearly defined by the Federal Constitution. These have been interpreted when necessary by the judicial department of the Federal Government which is the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is the organization, the history, and the practical working of this system of Federal Government which give to each Presidential election its outstanding importance. It is not surprising that at this time the eyes of the whole world should be fixed upon the American people in order to see what those people propose to do in various fields of policy when choosing members of their Government. What is done may greatly affect the security and the prosperity of every nation on the globe. The responsibility of the American people is, therefore, so great and so far reaching that they should not, indeed must not, approach the task which now confronts them without clear understanding of the issues involved. They must have the insight and the courage so to act as to promote the effectiveness and the influence of their own form of government as well as to establish still more strongly its position and power of leadership in the life of the world of today.

Three times in recent years I have presented in one form or another the relationship of the American people to world organization and world problems. In 1939 the topic was Toward a Federal World.[1] In 1940 it was Our United States in This Backward-Moving World.[2] In 1942 it was The Age of the Americas.[3] Meanwhile, the general subject then presented has vastly increased in importance.

We must not close our eyes to the fact that we are in a wholly new world. We must look backward for that knowledge of the past which brings understanding, but we must not look backward for the purpose of mere imitation. It has been pointed out again and again that the age-old barriers of time and of space have been broken down by the electric current and by the inventive skill of modern man. There are no longer any foreign nations except in an out-worn phrase. No matter on what part of the globe a people may have made their home, they are not now foreign but in the closest possible relationship day by day and hour by hour with every other civilized people. All nations are now neighbors and should always be good neighbors. In this country we hear a voice speaking from Australia, from China, from South Africa, from Brazil, or from Chile as clearly and as instantaneously as if the speakers were at our side. The result of the establishment of these close contacts between peoples once so distant, each from the other, has enormously increased the influence of the people of the United States and added greatly to their responsibility for the peace, the good order, and the prosperity of the world. The word "independence" must now be differently interpreted from the manner which has been customary. A nation may be independent in its form of government but it is not and cannot be independent intellectually, or economically, or industrially, or in the field of religion. All of these forces sweep over and through national boundaries and affect the peoples whom they reach almost as if there were no boundaries at all. It is also unfortunate to emphasize under these modern conditions the term "sovereign nation." This has become a purely legalistic phrase which may easily be harmfully interpreted. No nation, as no individual, can be sovereign in the sense that it is free from control by moral principles. It is the moral law and only the moral law which is sovereign. The phrase "national sovereignty" must be interpreted with that fact in mind. It was Mr. Gladstone who, like Burke, believed that politics were simply morality enlarged in action. Lord Acton saw a never-ceasing struggle for freedom which he identified absolutely with the cause of morality. This is the reason why we must look forward eagerly to the early coming of that day when the surest way to uphold the fundamental principles of freedom and of civilization will no longer be to wage even defensive war with all its appalling happenings. The principles of morality must be so well established that the acts and policies of both nations and individuals will conform to them. The serious question is whether or not it is in the power of civilized man to make this a world of moral nations as well as of moral individual human beings.

Outstanding in increasing the influence of the American people throughout the world and in strengthening their economic system is the literally stupendous development which has taken place in every form of industrial activity. From the mining of coal to the building of ships and airplanes, production has gone forward on a scale and with an excellence which no one would have thought possible a short generation ago. Accompanying this astonishing development and incidental to it has been the growth of corporate activity. It has been usual for persons who do not look beneath the surface to speak of a corporation as merely an instrument of financial power guided and controlled in their own interest by very few personalities. The true facts, however, are quite different. A corporation means cooperation. It is wholly consonant with democratic principles for it involves the cooperation of hundreds of thousands of individuals in common enterprises, each in accordance with the amount of his earnings and savings which he feels can be used for such cooperation. The citizen of very small means may in this way take part with his fellow citizens of great wealth in making possible these amazing industrial developments which become of greater importance day by day.

It is probably not generally known, although the facts are easily accessible, that in the American Telephone and Telegraph Co. there are, for example, no fewer than 651,700 stockholders; in the United States Steel Corporation there are 222,600; in the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. there are 209,600; in the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey there are 149,200; in the New York Central Railroad Co. there are 63,000, and in the Union Pacific Railway Co. there are 55,900. These facts should make it apparent to how large an extent American citizens of every type and kind are taking part directly in our Nation's great industrial system. This of itself should be a most instructive and tempting invitation to the peoples of other industrial nations to go and do likewise.

When His Holiness, Pope Pius XII, took his high office he chose as the motto of his administration this striking phrase: "Peace is the work of justice." There can be no truer or more convincing statement than this.

One may well wonder what would be the reflections of Julius Caesar and of Napoleon Bonaparte on the world of today. Those two great war captains set out to conquer the world of their day. The story of their attempted conquests makes two large and important chapters in the history of the Western World. They did their best—and it was extraordinary—in the effort to bring a large part of the world under practically single control. When such attempts failed, despite their Herculean effort, it was natural for civilized men to turn from the belief that such world conquest was possible and to hope that the centuries next to come would be marked by steady development of peaceful and cooperating nations in the fields of economics, industry, and public law. There were not a few signs during the century which followed Waterloo that this forecast of a new world was still very uncertain. Finally, when the selfish struggle for economic and political dominance reasserted itself and nations began to arm for another great struggle, it was not long before the doctrines of fascism and of nazi-ism made their appearance. They quickly took control of the public policy and life of two great and highly civilized peoples. What followed we all know.

In the field of education almost every nation, whether great or small, has accomplished much. Elementary schools for children and secondary schools for youth have had as their inspiration and source of guidance great universities whose scholars have been the intellectual ornaments of the world for several hundred years. The importance of these educational systems is once more indicated by the fact that the despots who so alarmingly developed fascism and nazi-ism directed immediate attention to gaining control of the schools and universities of the nation over which they were seeking dominance. Of course, they suppressed entirely the universities as organizations and instruments of free thought and free speech. On the other hand, they did not suppress but took entire control of the elementary and secondary school systems to the end that they might use them to train the next generation to acceptance of and belief in their cruel and reactionary principles of thought and of government. As a result, it is said on good authority that of the once great German people there are now millions of young men and young women under 30 years of age who have been brought completely under the control of the Nazis through school instruction and school discipline shaped to that end. Once more the American people will find opportunity in so improving their own system of education that they can offer to other nations an example of how family influence and the school can be used to greatest advantage in a truly liberal spirit both of conduct and of learning.

What appalls us is the fact that after there had been three or four centuries of genuine progress in the political organization and the intellectual life of the countries of western Europe, they should again find themselves subjected to the cruel and relentless control of dictators. Their dominant aim has been the complete suppression of every form of human liberty and the destruction or control by force of freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and freedom of economic, industrial, and political life. The result is that the world of today, once believed to be so highly civilized, is back, it would seem, at the very beginning of an orderly and peaceful organization and development. What can this mean for the future?

Even before this world-wide war for the defense of freedom is won we must begin the stupendous task of planning definitely for the days which are to come. We cannot afford to let matters drift in a way which will only complicate the problems to be solved and increase the difficulty of solving them. It is certainly not too much to say that the history of the past two centuries has made the United States of America the Hope of the World It is to our Nation that leadership has come through the operation of purely natural causes, and it is our Nation which must now accept this responsibility which has been placed upon it. A chief service which the United States has rendered and can continue to render to the world is to record the successful and fortunate working of the federal principle of government.

The United States has shown how 48 separate geographic and political units, spread over a vast continent, can unite in the formation and administration of a federal government in which cooperation is complete without the sacrifice of local self-government or local control of many public functions. It is to this federal principle to which the world now seeking for some system of effective international organization must look. The Federal system as established by the people of the United States is too highly and too closely organized to be completely imitated on a world-wide scale. Indeed, a world state would be wholly impracticable. There is, however, much to be learned from the study of the American system of government and its practical operation.

There is one important change which the people of the United States must make in their Constitution without delay. The provision that a treaty with another government requires ratification by a vote of two-thirds of the United States Senate is not only harmful and undemocratic, but antidemocratic as well. Treaties should be ratified, as statutes are enacted by a majority vote in each of the two Houses of Congress. The present system, if not changed, might easily lead to almost irreparable damage to the prosperity and happiness of the American people as well as to the great movement of international cooperation to establish and maintain world peace. The present constitutional provision makes it possible for a very small number of Senators—one-third of a quorum plus one—representing perhaps only ten millions of the country's vast population to prevent the ratification of a treaty of highest importance for national prosperity and international cooperation and peace. Were this done by a majority vote in each of the two Houses of Congress, the people themselves would be responsible. The present plan of action, however, completely separates the responsibility of the American people from ratification or rejection of a treaty. There is no more important question than this before the country at the present moment. To effect this vitally important change, the pending amendment to the Federal Constitution should be adopted by the people without delay. Otherwise, no one can foretell what damage may be done to the public welfare, both national and international.[4]

Still another notable illustration of the federal principle is to be seen in the British Commonwealth of Nations brought into existence, to succeed what had been the British Empire, by the epoch-marking Statute of Westminster, passed almost without dissent by the British Parliament in 1931. In the British Commonwealth of Nations, we have an organized group of independent nations united by common faith in the fundamental principles of free government as well as through personal loyalty to a ruling monarch. This plan of organization might easily be made world-wide in its scope by substituting for loyalty to a ruling monarch, loyalty to a body of ruling principles formulated and agreed upon by the cooperating independent nations. Beyond question, the path of progress lies in the direction of the application in a new and practical form of the underlying federal principles upon which the Government of the United States of America and the governments of the British Commonwealth of Nations so firmly rest.

The time has come when the people of the United States should substitute the term "international policy" for the term "foreign policy," and "international relations" for "foreign relations." As has already been pointed out, it is the thought which underlies the term "foreign" which has been put in the background by the happenings of our time. If the acts of the people of the United States and the policies of their Government are to play so large a part in guiding and shaping the world of tomorrow, then it is imperative that the American people themselves think and act on the highest possible plane of moral understanding and effectiveness. The struggles of petty politics and the mean-spirited ambitions of those seeking public privilege or advantage from government should have no place in the life and political action of our people. We have the opportunity to show the whole world that we can debate and discuss questions of national policy and national aims with unselfish disinterestedness, putting aside the struggles and ambitions of petty politics and gain seeking.

Other nations have also been profoundly impressed by the fact that the people of the United States originally almost wholly Anglo-Saxon in origin, now count in their citizenship millions of representatives of many other racial and linguistic origins. They are Teutonic, they are Italian, they are French, they are Spanish, they are Portuguese, they are Scandinavian, they are Slavic, they are Oriental, they are Latin American, they are Jewish, they are African. It has been found practicable to weld these different elements together, often without difficulty, into a genuine unity of citizenship and understanding. Those who would lay stress upon differences of racial origin in a democracy are not the friends of the democratic principle and the democratic ideal. Moreover, domestic policies and international policy have now become so closely intertwined that they are no longer to be looked upon as separate. There is no nation in the world, whatever its size or whatever its natural resources, which is now able to lead its full and complete economic and industrial life without drawing upon the products of other nations. The notion that a government can build around its boundaries trade barriers as if they were military fortifications and yet have a safe and a prosperous life has become the impossible. It is not so long since in our own country the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922 and the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930 gave ample demonstration of this truth.

It is because the nations have become economically interdependent that they must without delay unite in a well ordered plan of international cooperation not only to promote trade and commerce and to build up industry, but to remove the temptation to endeavor to reach these ends by waging military war or, most of all, by seeking world domination. In other words, international collaboration is now absolutely essential to national prosperity as well as to national security. The victory which the Allied Powers will shortly achieve in this stupendous war of defense that we are now waging should be the end of one era and the beginning of another in which international cooperation, on the basis of sound moral principle, will establish and maintain international peace and open the way to generations of prosperity and happiness.

The Pan American Union offers still another example of how international understanding and cooperation may be established and advanced. The suggestion that such a union should be called into being was first made as long ago as 1815 by the distinguished Latin-American statesman, Gen. Simón Bolivar. It was, however, not until 1889 that the first formal conference was held at Washington. Since then there have been many such conferences and the union has been established in the noble building erected for it at Washington, largely through the generous benefaction of Andrew Carnegie. The excellent results of the work of the union are increasingly apparent year by year. Despite their differences of racial origin and of language, the North American nations and those of Latin America are being steadily drawn into closer cooperation with each other. They have year by year a fuller understanding of their several characteristics and problems.

Progress is also making through such important international conferences as have recently been held at Hot Springs, Va., at Atlantic City, N. J., at Bretton Woods, N. H., and now at Dumbarton Oaks, D. C. To establish the habit of consultation and cooperation is to make genuine advance even though the results of any particular conference may seem relatively insignificant.

It is because the American people live under an organized Federal Government and have economic and intellectual relations with every part of the world that they can and must offer leadership in effecting the world organization toward which our wise and far-sighted statesmen have long been looking with confidence and with hope. The protection of our form of government and the constant strengthening of our economic life and our industrial system are largely dependent upon our taking leadership in rebuilding a civilized world which through international cooperation shall be under the dominance of moral law. Then and then only may war pass into history. Then and then only will industrial prosperity, intellectual growth, and social satisfaction be achieved. Truly America has become the Hope of the World.

Young Pole's Tale Bares Death Camp

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of September 4, 1944:

YOUNG POLE'S TALE BARES DEATH CAMP—ANOTHER HORROR SITE REPORTED NEAR LUBLIN—THOUSANDS OF VICTIMS CREMATED

Moscow, September 3.—The story of another German death camp, situated at Sobibur, Poland, smaller than that at Maidanek but which, nevertheless, is estimated to have been the execution site for "hundreds of thousands of persons," was published in today's Komsomolskaya Pravda, organ of the Young Communist League. The story was told by two Red Army officers, Maj. A. Rutman and Guards Lt. S. Krasilschik.

Sobibur, like Maidanek, is not far from Lublin. The methods of execution were the same, and the Germans exported a huge output, including clothing, shoes and even hair and human fat from bodies of the victims.

Komsomolskaya Pravda's story is, in large part, an interview with a Polish youth, W. B. Feinberg, who said he had been a prisoner in the camp 17 months but had managed to escape in October 1943, in a rebellion planned by Soviet war prisoners.

According to Feinberg there were three separate sections in the Sobibur camp: two of them for working prisoners, who numbered approximately 300 constantly, and the other for executions, for which 8 or 10 trainloads carrying 800 to 1,000 persons arrived daily.

"In June, 1943, I observed the arrival from Bialystok of a trainload of persons packed as tightly as possible," Feinberg told reporters. "In the train were people who were dying and people already dead. They hadn't been fed or given water during the entire trip. Both the dead and live persons were sprinkled with chloride of lime.

"I saw how the Germans lifted children and threw them upon the ground, then kicked them around. I saw how defenseless people were sent out against hungry packs of dogs which chewed them to death. In our camp was a horrible hangman, a German named Boxer, from Berlin, who could with one blow of a stick kill a man—and he bragged about it. Another German, a chauffeur named Paul, specialized in severing heads, hands, or legs with one blow from an axe."

Feinberg's description of the third camp section was second hand because he had never been permitted to enter it. But he said its features were well known to all prisoners. He said the Germans executed approximately 1,800 persons at a time there after herding them into a large building that was sealed and into which poison gas was pumped. The Germans looked on through a glass opening in the roof, and when the poison had done its job they threw a switch which caused the floor to open, automatically dumping the bodies into the cellar, where they were loaded into wagons.

For a long time the Germans hauled the bodies into a nearby forest and buried them in mass graves, but toward the end of 1943 they began to burn the bodies in a huge open-air, multilayered crematory.

"Daily thousands of corpses were burned," Feinberg said. "Bonfires burned day and night. Flames rose high in the sky. The smell was such that we couldn't eat or breathe. The rails on which the bodies were burned had special pans for the collection of human fat. Sometimes people were burned alive."

Feinberg also described the escape plot of October 14, 1943, when approximately 400 persons broke from camp after killing several German guards and officials. The prisoners broke through the barbed-wire fence, made their way across the moat, then crossed the minefields that covered the approaches to the camp.

He said the Germans trailed them relentlessly, even using airplanes. Of the 400 who left the camp alive, he estimated that only 50 escaped with their lives. After this escape, Feinberg said the Germans blew up the camp, destroying most of the evidence of its existence.

Experience

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Mount Vernon (Ohio) News of September 5, 1944:

EXPERIENCE

Senator TRUMAN, in his speech accepting the Democratic Vice Presidential nomination, laid down what is expected to be the pattern of the campaign for the reelection of President Roosevelt for a fourth term.

There is no substitute for experience, said Senator TRUMAN, asserting that President Roosevelt's leadership should not be discarded for that of a man "who lacks experience."

An argument of this nature does have its vote-pulling power if it is accepted at its face value.

But it will not stand up under close scrutiny.

Senator TRUMAN himself is campaigning to replace a man who has far more experience in executive capacity, Vice President WALLACE. Mr. WALLACE has had years of experience, but the Democratic Party discarded him for Mr. TRUMAN, wholly lacking in experience as an executive.

President Roosevelt himself was without experience, if you measure by Mr. TRUMAN'S yardstick, when he was elected to the Presidency, yet he was adjudged competent to take over as the country's Chief Executive in the midst of a depression.

Mr. Roosevelt had served as Governor of New York, it is true, but so has Mr. Dewey, who, according to Mr. TRUMAN, is a "man who lacks experience."

The Nation has had 31 Presidents, all of whom—again by Mr. TRUMAN'S yardstick—were without experience when they assumed office. Some of them were great executives, some were good, and some were ordinary.

But even the greatest were inexperienced when they assumed the duties of President.

And, as far as that is concerned, the country never has suffered from a change in its Executives.

As great as were Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln, they were not indispensable. The country continued to grow and prosper and gain in wealth and power after they had stepped out of office.

The truth of the matter is that the progress of America to the heights has been due to the system and principles we have followed, not because of the identity of the men who have occupied the Executive Mansion.

To say that the Nation cannot continue its progress without the services of any particular man is to say that that one man is greater than America, greater than American ideals and principles.

And such a contention just won't hold water.

Letter From Pilot Carl R. Pepper, Jr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, some time ago I was privileged to read a letter from one of our soldier boys, my dear young friend Pilot Carl R. Pepper, Jr., of my home town of Bristol, Va. Knowing Carl as I do, the letter made a deep impression upon me. It made such an impression that I asked and obtained permission from his mother to insert the letter in the RECORD. The letter, I believe, gives a true insight into the very heart and soul of the Russian people. For this reason I hope it will be widely read.

Somehow I am not afraid of such a patriotic, self-sacrificing, music-loving, and appreciative people. When the heart of man is right, sooner or later other things, if wrong, have a way of righting themselves. My opinion is that Russia will come out of this war spiritually strengthened and will take her rightful place among the progressive, enlightened, and peace-loving nations of the earth.

We should all feel grateful to Russia. Her heroic fight to preserve freedom from the mailed fist of the dictators has saved thousands, perhaps millions, of American lives.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein the letter above referred to:

JULY 2, 1944.

DEAR FOLKS: You can take it from this kid that there's no place like Uncle Sam's good ole' States as far as really living is concerned. I've really been traveling around and have seen more places than I'd ever dreamed of seeing—the folks living in every place so far are just existing. It's really pathetic. I wouldn't trade a tramp's chances in the States for all these villas and patios, etc., that you hear so much about.

I just wrote you all a very brief note concerning the Russians so I want to really give you a picture as best I can about them. To start with they're the happiest people I've yet encountered. They sing the most beautiful music, Mom, and every one of them has terrific voices. They sing the Russian folk songs, etc., while working or doing most anything. The harmony and expression is really wonderful. I'm only sorry I had to leave before I got a chance to really get in on some of their songfests.

Everyone, both young and old, work like beavers at anything there is to be done. Women work on roads, clear the shambles of those grotesque figures which were once beautiful homes and buildings, work the crops, and a million other equally as hard jobs right along with the men. These women of Russia are unique to say the least. There is no such thing as rationing of any commodities as there is no need for it. These people are truly one for all and all for one. Soap is about the rarest of luxuries as there just isn't any to be had. Even without soap, however, it's remarkable how clean and neat these folks are. The women have the most beautiful complexion in the world. Every one of them is as healthy as can be, which I suppose can be credited to the rough life they lead.

Pop, you'd go for those little Russian kids. They're the cutest, brightest little rascals I've ever seen. In one place we stopped a beautiful little girl kept following us around town. We took her back to the airdrome with us and one of the fellows who speaks Russian found out that she was 13 years old, both her mother and father were killed, and she had been performing the duties of a nurse in the battle of Stalingrad. She was so cute. Hank, the fellow who speaks Russian, asked her if she would like me for a father and she said I was too young for that, but she'd be pleased to have me as a brother. We gave her chewing gum which she would bite off in small pieces, chew the sweet out of and then spit it out. The Russians there treated us like kings. They gave a movie for us—a Russian movie—which we took Gaula, the little girl friend to. Although we didn't understand the movie I sho' got a kick out of Gaula as she was simply fascinated with it. She brought us fruit to camp the next day in appreciation. We gave her all kinds of wings, etc., for souvenirs. She is joining the women's army right away and she'll probably be tops in this. Honest folks I'd given anything to have adopted that little girl and about a thousand and one others there.

The hospitality shown us by the Russians was unbelievable. They couldn't seem to do enough for us. We couldn't fly to our destinated place as the weather was too bad around the mountains so we just dropped in on this field. These people had had no notice of our stopping there but we had no sooner gotten there when they had beds, a hot meal, and terrific entertaining in the form of music all whipped up for us. It makes me ashamed of us when I think of how little we have done for these people. I just wish I could describe how absolutely "swellelegant" they were to us during our entire stay there. They wouldn't let us do anything but enjoy ourselves.

All that bull about morals, etc., in Russia being so low is another piece of propaganda put out by someone who doesn't know the score. The girls are very beautiful as I've already mentioned, but they are interested only in their own kind. They are nice to the Yanks and talk to us, etc.—they even have dances for us, but as for making love they are just a little on the careful side of the fence as lots of the boys found out. The Germans raped and murdered so darn many of these folks that they are leary of other men besides their own. They don't just have babies by carloads and marry as we'd been led to believe. They have weddings by the priest the same as we do, and it really is rough on any girl who has a baby that isn't married. They are really terrific.

The main trouble with our relations with Russia is that we just don't have sense enough to realize that these folks live differently from us in lots of ways. We don't give a damn about learning the truth and if some big-time operator tells us something we just take that to be the truth. All of us feel the same about this trip. We aren't doing enough for these people. They aren't blood thirsty, uncivilized people. They're a people with a soul and heart who love to live in peace with everyone but when they were kicked in the stomach as they have been then they're in there pitching—all for one and one for all—it's a swell set-up. They are a fearless race and the destitution which they've endured is unbelievable. There wasn't a home, or what have you left after the Nazi retreat. I just wish we would wise up and give them the biggest part of our aid instead of some of these other countries which don't really seem to appreciate it. Any skepticism I've ever had about these people has sho' been banished after this trip. We should give these people everything possible. Chub, you can tell Honest that he can take it from us guys that these folks really deserve the very best. I could just go on and on about these people of Russia but I'd best quit as you probably couldn't believe me anyway. I'd give anything to get stationed there though and hope I get a chance to do so soon. I'm sho' going to save candy, gum, soap, and cigarettes for any chance I get to go back there. Those kids are so cute. I'll write you all everything about the remainder of my trip later although nothing has been as interesting or as swell as the visit to Russia.

I'll sho' be glad to get some mail from you all and its probably waiting on me back in Limie land. I can't wait to hear about the skipper and the marines. I sho' miss you all and love you more than I could ever tell you. Oodles of love to each and everyone.

CARL, Jr.

P. S.—Ken and I bought a camera finally and will send you some pictures when we get some made.

Our Privilege and Duty To Vote Election Day, November 7, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, November 7, 1944, is the most important election day we have ever had in the history of our country. As our armed forces move forward to a smashing victory over our enemies, we now face the greatest battle of all time to preserve our form of government and to restore real stability in our domestic affairs and especially in our fiscal system. We must do everything within our power to help win the war and we must do everything within our power also to assist the veterans of this war in their return to civilian life. We must also help in every possible way to make the reconversion of our economy from war to peace as successful as possible. This all calls for outstanding leadership and careful planning and administration.

November 7 is election day, and on that day we must prove to the world that Americans value their right to take part directly in the selection of Government officials and in the management and control of our Government. This right is one that our forefathers fought and died to establish and our men and women of today have fought and died to preserve. It is the duty of each and all of us to vote and to urge every qualified voter to vote in this election. The size of our vote November 7 will prove to the world how much we value that privilege and responsibility and by the size of that vote we can convince the world that the American form of government marches forward with vigor, determination, and strength.

Remember, every qualified voter should vote at the general election, November 7, 1944.

Let us all exercise our own right and privilege and responsibility of voting and then let us call upon as many qualified voters as possible and remind them of this great privilege and responsibility and then urge them to vote.

Liberation of Paris

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, in the home-town paper at Corydon, Iowa, a mother, who was born in France and lived in that country until her marriage to an American soldier during the First World War, Mr. C. F. Brubaker, expresses the deep emotions within her breast when Paris was liberated. Her happiness knew no bounds. At the present time Mrs. Brubaker's only child, Gilbert, is in the armed services. As a native of one country and citizen of another she prays that the time will come when "Liberty, equality and fraternity" will prevail throughout the world.

Under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include the brief statement from Mrs. C. F. Brubaker as it appeared in the Times-Republican of Corydon, Iowa, in the issue of August 31:

When the fateful message came over the air waves "Paris, the city of light; Paris, the capital of liberty; Paris, the great eternal, has been liberated," millions of people in many lands rejoiced heartily. But for the French people themselves, wherever they were, the word "joy" was entirely inadequate to express their reaction.

When my mother and I heard this historic news, our emotion was so intense that for several minutes we couldn't even talk, and when we finally realized that we were not just day dreaming, that, our beloved Paris had really been rid of the Nazi pestilence, tears of joy streamed down our faces.

Our great city was free again and freed by the hand of Frenchmen. All the humiliation of the last 4 years seemed to be erased by the courageous sacrifice of those men and women who rose to help deliver their oppressed and martyred capital. The tricolor was flying once again.

I remembered how in June 1940, broken hearted and despondent, I had put away my own French flag, wondering when it could be used again. At last the day had come. Reverently, I took it from the box where it had laid for so long and with trembling fingers and a singing heart I unfurled it in front of my house. As I watched it wave in the breeze of this happy August day I never remembered it to look so grand or mean so much. Then the wish came in my heart for a better world, where never again would there be those who would pull it down and despoil this symbol of "Liberty, equality, and fraternity."

H. R. 4650 Embodies Vicious Principle of Religious Discrimination

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a resolution passed by the executive committee of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists that has reference to H. R. 4650, now pending before the Committee on Military Affairs.

I am personally opposed to this type of legislation, Mr. Speaker, because it embodies the vicious principle of religious discrimination. It is for this reason I am making this resolution available to all Members of Congress:

We, the executive committee of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, respectfully request the members of the House Military Affairs Committee to allow H. R. 4650 to die in committee rather than to approve it for passage or report it out for discussion to the floor of the House.

In this connection we point out that Congress, in the enactment of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, made provision for men of religious conscientious convictions regarding combatant and noncombatant forms of service to be used in the military forces; that the War and Navy Departments made provision for the services of men classified I-A-O in the Medical Department of the Army and the Hospital Corps of the Navy; that in such assignments these men have risked as much and jeopardized their lives equally with all other servicemen; that they have shared the war's hardships, rigors, and dangers wherever fighting has taken place; and that many of them are wearing Purple Hearts, having displayed a courage which is respected by their fellow soldiers and officers. The fact that this courage in the case of I-A-O men accompanies a deep religious faith should be the last possible reason why the United States, avowedly fighting for freedom of religion, should penalize such men as these.

We further invite attention to the fact that Seventh-day Adventist men in the armed forces, of whom there are approximately 12,000, responded to their country's call. Through medical cadet training prepared in cooperation with the Medical Department of the Army, and at their own costs, and encouraged by their church, they prepared themselves for skilled life-saving service before their induction. Their religious convictions regarding noncombatancy have not been a ruse to get out of danger or make them the less willing to risk their own lives to save their fellow soldiers. A I–A–O medical soldier out on the front line picking up wounded soldiers is under constant fire. A man who goes under fire again and again without protection of arms to rescue wounded fellow soldiers ought not to be accused of lack of courage or denied equal treatment, consideration, and benefits with all other soldiers. Otherwise, many a I–A soldier will receive a class A discharge with full benefits while the I–A–O soldier, who saved his fellow's life while risking his own will be denied these benefits by the class B discharge proposed in H. R. 4650.

That ought not to happen in America, not alone for the soldier's sake, but for America's sake. It is neither fair, nor democratic, nor American.

I–A–O men are going into action on all the world's battle fronts, serving side by side with thousands of I–A men also engaged in noncombatant activities. They are carrying the wounded from the field of fire, manning their stations everywhere, armed strongly with their faith.

When such men come home they ought not to be discriminated against on account of their religion. They have done the same work as other soldiers in noncombatant lines who have been classified I–A. I–A–O men should continue to be recognized as equally eligible for mustering-out pay, bonuses, and other veterans' benefits as all other honorably discharged soldiers. We ask you to exert your influences to see that no discrimination of this nature is put into effect.

J. L. McELHANY, President.
E. D. DICK, Secretary.

Reconversion Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN B. BENNETT
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I hope the conferees having charge of the war mobilization and reconversion legislation will reinsert the provision to extend unemployment benefits to civilian employees of the Federal Government. While it is impossible to accurately estimate the number of persons who will be temporarily unemployed, due to the transition period when industry ceases making war materials and reengages in peacetime activity, it is known that this transition cannot take place overnight. It will take some time and there are bound to be large areas of temporary unemployment. One of the purposes of the pending bill is to anticipate this situation and to provide for it. The civilian employees of the United States Government have contributed magnificently toward the war effort and it is unfair to prevent them from sharing the unemployment benefits given to other American workmen doing the same kind of work in private industry. There is no just basis for such discrimination.

Everyone hopes that there will be a minimum of unemployment because the real purpose of democracy and free enterprise is to provide employment—not unemployment. Every effort should be made to provide a decent job at decent wages for each and every returning serviceman. But in spite of all our efforts in this direction, we cannot escape the fact that a nation at war cannot reengage in peacetime activity without resulting readjustments. One of the major objects of this legislation is to provide for the interim period that will be required to make the change. I hope this bill, when finally passed, will fully envisage that situation and provide for it adequately without discrimination to any citizen.

Farmers Help Everybody When They Work Together—Five Questions About Cooperatives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include Information Bulletins Nos. 3 and 4 issued by the National Council of Farm Cooperatives.

I have previously inserted Bulletins Nos. 1 and 2, and feel that the matter presented in these bulletins is of great importance to the future of American agriculture and to the consideration of the problems of farm cooperatives.

The bulletins follow:

FARMERS HELP EVERYBODY WHEN THEY WORK TOGETHER

Agriculture is an industry of some six and one-half million family-sized units. This is true because farm production is generally most efficient on the family farm. However, the comparatively small operation which is an advantage in farm production is a handicap in the purchasing of farm supplies and in the processing and marketing of farm products.

As industrial production has shifted from the home to the factory and as American business has become big business, farmers still maintaining the family farm have been forced to find more efficient ways of buying and selling.

This they have done by uniting with their neighbors, using the cooperative form of business enterprise. In this way farmers have built their own business institutions for buying farm supplies and marketing farm products at cost. Thus the farmers of America have themselves forged a tool for existing in an economy of big business. Through this tool of farmer-owned and farmer-controlled cooperatives, farmers have helped strengthen and maintain the American system of free enterprise.

THROUGH THEIR COOPERATIVES FARMERS HAVE CONTRIBUTED MUCH MORE

They have pioneered in the improvement of the quality of food.

They have fostered standardization of products through a system of grades.

They have insisted upon licensed inspection and official weighing of products.

They have improved storage facilities, thus reducing the loss of products through spoilage.

They have reduced transportation costs by pooling small lots, designing improved transportation facilities, and increasing the percentage of truck miles under load.

They have reduced production costs by adapting farm-production supplies to the farmers' actual needs.

They have, through research and education, brought improved methods of production into more general use.

They have lowered the cost of credit by reducing production and marketing risks.

They have made distribution more efficient—less costly.

Through orderly marketing they have tended to stabilize farm prices.

They have acted as pace setters generally in the field of marketing and in the purchasing of farm supplies.

Farmers, through their cooperatives, operated on a nonprofit basis, have made these and other contributions to the general welfare.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF FARMER COOPERATIVES.
WASHINGTON, D. C.

FIVE QUESTIONS ABOUT FARMER COOPERATIVES

1. WHAT IS A FARMER COOPERATIVE?

It is a form of voluntary business organization set up by farmers to perform services on a cost-of-doing-business basis in such fields as the purchasing of farm supplies and the marketing of farm products.

2. WHEN DID FARMER COOPERATION START IN AMERICA?

It started when our forefathers swapped work to help each other raise barns or kill hogs or do other jobs that one farmer could not well do alone. Later, as more and more of his crop and livestock production went to the people in the cities and less and less was consumed at home, the farmer faced many problems beyond his line fence that were too big for him to handle efficiently by himself—problems in the assembling, grading, processing, transporting, and marketing of farm products, and problems in the purchasing of farm production supplies. To meet these problems he formalized early American cooperation, and as early as 1810 we had cooperative cheese factories in America. These early American cooperatives preceded by more than a quarter of a century the founding of the Rochdale Cooperative in England.

3. WHO OWNS AND CONTROLS A FARMER COOPERATIVE?

The members who use its services. Their ownership is usually represented in membership certificates, stock, or some other evidence of the members' investment in the cooperative. Control of the cooperative is distributed democratically among the membership—usually on the basis of "one man, one vote."

4. HOW DOES A FARMER COOPERATIVE WORK?

A farmer cooperative acts as the agent of its farmer members. They use it to provide themselves with services on a cost-of-doing business-basis. Usually to cover their cooperative's operating costs plus a margin of safety, the members provide operating advances in amounts about equal to the going trade margins for similar services. When the year's operation is over and the books have been closed, they get back as patronage refunds the difference between what they advanced for the services and what the services actually cost. These refunds may be in cash or—in cases where members are adding to their cooperative's working capital—in the form of stock or certificates of equity. Interest rates on such member-invested capital is limited.

5. WHY ARE FARMER COOPERATIVES NEEDED?

Because farming, though highly important in sum total to the Nation's economy, is actually a business of more than 6,000,000 individual family farms. These farms, averaging only 87 tillable acres, are faced with as many problems of buying and processing and selling as the big corporations have—and without their concentration of money, specialized manpower or facilities. Only by joining together in voluntary cooperatives can farmers provide themselves with the capital, manpower, and facilities needed for efficient operation. Only through organization can farmers meet other organized groups on an equal basis. Only by working together can farmers carry on research and develop new ideas that will benefit all people—the consumers of food as well as the producers.

YARDSTICK FOR A FARMER COOPERATIVE

The rules laid down by the United States Government for a farmer cooperative are specific. Generally speaking, a nonprofit farmers' cooperative * * *:

1. Is democratically controlled by its members—usually "one farmer, one vote."
2. Returns its net savings to users.
3. Treats all users alike, whether members or nonmembers.
4. Does most of its business with farmer members.
5. Does, in the case of a purchasing association, at least 85 percent of its dollar volume of business with agricultural producers.
6. Has most of its stock and voting rights in the hands of active patrons.
7. Limits rate of dividends on capital stock to a nominal rate of interest.
8. Maintains records showing its operations and its members' equities.
9. Has only reasonable reserves for necessary purposes.

Magnificent Supply Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 6, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, it has recently been revealed that, in the first 70 days after D-day, in the Normandy invasion area alone, some of the losses in equipment were, for the Ground Forces, 1,750 quarter-ton trucks; 1,500 mortars; 83,000 miles of wire; 900 tanks; 2,400 automatic rifles. In the same period, the Air Forces used over 44,000,000 gallons of gasoline; dropped approximately 55,000 tons of bombs; lost some 3,000 planes—all of which necessarily had to be replaced.

Add to this the problem of supplying our men and the prisoners of war which they capture with their daily food requirements and some idea can be gained of the magnitude of the supply job alone. Already the Army's Quartermaster Corps has secured 1,000,000 pounds of turkey in anticipation of affording a Thanksgiving Day feast for the armed forces; and turkey in 12-ounce cans is also to be sent to our boys interned by Germany. It is hoped also that Japan will allow shipments to our prisoners in their camps.

THE CASUALTY LISTS

The Army has announced that, for all theaters, for the period from Pearl Harbor through August 13, its casualties have been 53,101 killed, 142,686 wounded, of whom 60,314 have returned to duty, 44,643 missing, and 44,408 prisoners of war. In the same period the Navy lost 16,677 killed, 7,250 wounded, 8,577 missing, 2,523 prisoners. Casualties for all services totaled 343,191. The list included many from the Fourth Congressional District.

LEND-LEASE

As of July 1, last, the value of shipments to our allies on lend-lease amounted to $28,270,000,000. Items to Great Britain included 6,000 planes and 9,900 tanks; 4,800 planes, 51,100 tanks and 73,000 trucks and other motor vehicles in the Mediterranean. Russian aid included more than 11,000 planes and 300,000 trucks and other military vehicles.

It will be recalled that when lend-lease was proposed many of us warned that before the books were balanced an effort would be made to write off the debts of other nations. This was denied by the proponents of the plan.

Just a year ago the President, in his eleventh lend-lease report to Congress, stated:

> Victory and a secure peace are the only coin in which we can be repaid.

When adverse comment resulted Mr. Roosevelt said that he had never read the letter transmitting the report, that a mistake had been made while he was attending the Quebec Conference, and he wished to apologize for it.

On August 22 last Leo T. Crowley, Foreign Economic Administrator, in a speech before a Capital luncheon club, said:

> Since lend-lease material is being used against our mutual enemy, it is questionable whether our allies should be required to repay us. It is hard to estimate the extent to which American expenditures should be repaid because it is hard to estimate to what extent they are being used to save American lives.

Subsequently that speech was characterized in the Washington press as a "trial balloon." The Washington Evening Star, a conservative newspaper, one which never has been "anti-New Deal administration," in its issue of August 26, carried an editorial containing the following statements:

> Leo T. Crowley, Foreign Economic Administrator, has taken what looks like the first step in an effort to "unsell" the people of this country on the belief that the foreign recipients of lease-lend aid are going to repay us in any conventional sense of that term.

After citing the statement of Mr. Crowley, as above quoted, the Star editorial continues:

> Now that statement, or rather its implication that we should not seek repayment, may be sound enough. But the unfortunate part is that this is not what the people of this country were led to expect when lease-lend was first proposed.
> At that time the impression was created that we would be repaid for the assistance to be extended, in kind if not in dollars. Perhaps that was helpful in "selling" lease-lend to the country in the first instance; but if it develops in the future that we are not going to be repaid, then the early job of salesmanship is apt to pay dividends in the form of resentment and bad feeling toward our present allies.

DEMOBILIZATION LEGISLATION

The House last week passed its version of the so-called reconversion bill, which would establish an Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion under a $15,000 per year Director to be appointed by the President with Senate confirmation. The House refused to go along with the Senate proposal to give special additional payments to some 3,000,000 Federal employees. The Senate measure provides for administration by an eight-man board, rather than a single administrator. The two measures are now in conference, where an attempt is being made to iron out differences.

Major General Davis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, a great soldier, administrator, and citizen, the late Maj. Gen. Robert Courtney Davis, is deservedly remembered in an editorial tribute in the New York Times of yesterday. The editorial follows:

MAJOR GENERAL DAVIS

Maj. Gen. Robert Courtney Davis, who had a soldier's burial at Arlington Cemetery yesterday, was not yet 68. Few men have worked harder or to better purpose. From West Point he passed through the grades to major general. He took part in the campaign against Santiago de Cuba, in the battle of El Caney, and in the Philippines in various engagements against the insurgents. He was "Major General The Adjutant General" from 1922 till his retirement in 1927. His was the great task, successfully performed, of administering the Adjusted Compensation Act and distributing payment to the returned soldiers. He had a genius for administration, and he plowed his way easily through confusions and complications.

As assistant, acting, or Adjutant General in 1918 he saw in 6 months an increase of the Army from 300,000 to 2,000,000. A member of the board appointed to consider the reorganization of the General Staff, he stayed in the War Department till after reorganization had been effected. In the last 5 years his labors as executive director of the New York chapter of the American Red Cross have made him one of the best known and valued figures of this community. Before the United States entered the war the chapter gave intelligent, fruitful, and manifold relief to refugees and other sufferers abroad. Constantly asking for more nurses, ambulance drivers, contributions of food and supplies, the humane impulses it had quickened responded again and again and always more generously after the country took a hand in the struggle.

The chapter has been fertile in ways and means of aid. The blood banks are but one of the most striking of a whole series of intelligent and effectual helps of our armed forces. Health and life, rest, recreation have been given here and across the seas to the men and to their families. The Red Cross has been multifariously kind and able. As the strong and gentle head of this great stationary and traveling college of benevolence and good will, General Davis endeared himself to millions and added new honor to an honorable career.

First Address of President Sergio Osmeña to His Cabinet, Thursday, August 10, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARLOS P. ROMULO

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. ROMULO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of President Sergio Osmeña to his Cabinet, Thursday, August 10, 1944:

Gentlemen of the Cabinet, 9 days ago when I performed the painful duty of announcing the passing of our beloved leader, President Manuel L. Quezon, I said, in part:

"President Quezon's death is a great loss to the freedom-loving world. No champion of liberty fought for such a noble cause with more determination and against greater odds. His whole life was dedicated to the achievement of his people's freedom, and it is one of the sad paradoxes of fate that with the forces of victory fast approaching the Philippines, he should pass away now and be deprived of seeing the culmination of his labors—the freedom of his people."

President Quezon was a champion of freedom in war and in peace. The plains and hills of Bataan, where the brave Filipino and American soldiers faced with heroism the overwhelming power of the Japanese invader, were also his field of action during the Revolutionary days. The city of Washington, where his body temporarily rests, was the scene of his early appeals and peaceful efforts for Philippine freedom. It was here, almost 30 years ago, where he secured from Congress the promise of independence which is contained in the preamble of the Jones law. Here, again, 18 years late, he succeeded in obtaining the passage of the Tydings-McDuffie Act—a reenactment with some slight amendments of the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law which was rejected previously by the Philippine Legislature. Pursuant to the provisions of the Tydings-McDuffie law, which was accepted by the Filipino people, we drafted our constitution and established the present Commonwealth of the Philippines, and elected Manual L. Quezon as its first President.

When the war came and it became necessary to evacuate Manila, President Quezon, frail and sick as he was, moved with his cabinet to Corregidor, where he shared with the soldiers the rigors of tunnel life, and from there braved the hazards of a perilous journey to the Visayas, Mindanao, Australia, and America, in order to continue the fight for the freedom of his people. Here in Washington with his war cabinet, he functioned as the legitimate government of the Filipino people and served as the symbol of their redemption.

It was largely through his untiring efforts that the Philippines was made a member of the United Nations and accorded a seat in the Pacific war council. It was through his initiative that negotiations were held, resulting in the introduction of Senate Joint Resolutions 93 and 94. By the terms of Senate Joint Resolution 93, the advancement of the date of independence prior to July 4, 1946, was authorized and the pledge given to the Filipino people by President Roosevelt in 1941—that Philippine independence will not only be established but also protected—was sanctioned by Congress. His efforts to secure the rehabilitation of the Philippines from the ravages of war resulted in the enactment by Congress of Senate Joint Resolution 94 which provides for the physical and economic rehabilitation of the Philippines. Even before Congress definitely acted on this resolution he had already created the Post-war Planning Board, entrusting it, together with his Cabinet, with the task of making studies and submitting recommendations looking toward the formulation of a comprehensive rehabilitation program for the Philippines.

In the last few moments before his martyrdom the great Rizal lamented that he would not be able to see the dawn of freedom break over his beloved country, but he prophesied that his countrymen would see that day. "I've sown the seeds," he said, "others are left to reap." Quezon, more fortunate than Rizal, died with the comforting thought that the freedom of the Philippines was already an incontestable reality, awaiting only the certain defeat of the enemy for its full expression.

The immediate duty, then, of those of us who, under the mandate of the Constitution and the laws of the Philippines, are charged with the mission of continuing President Quezon's work, is to follow the course he has laid, to maintain and strengthen our partnership with America, and to march forward with the United Nations with unwavering faith and resolute determination until complete victory is won.

The tide of the war which rose high against us in the early stages of the struggle has turned in our favor. The forces of victory are on the march everywhere—in Europe, in India, and China, and in the Pacific. Normandy and Brittany have been occupied by the Anglo-American forces. Poland is half reconquered by our great Russian ally. Two-thirds of the Italian peninsula are in our hands, while thousands and thousands of planes continue to batter and destroy German communication and production centers, bringing the war to the German homeland.

In the Pacific the progress of the war has been equally impressive. Most of the Japanese strongholds in the Bismarck archipelago, in New Guinea, in the Gilberts, and in the Marshalls have fallen. The Japanese bastion of Saipan is in Allied hands; so is Tinian. The reconquest of Guam is almost completed. B-29's, the American super fortresses, are already penetrating the Japanese inner defenses, causing destruction in the enemy's vital centers of production. General MacArthur's forces are hammering the enemy's outposts only 250 miles from the Philippines, while the United States Navy, maintaining mastery in the central Pacific, is relentlessly attacking Palau, Yap, Ponape, and the Bonin Islands in its steady advance toward the Philippines, China, and Japan.

The size and strength of the Allied landings in Europe, supported by thousands of planes and using thousands of ships, surpasses the imagination. It is no wonder that before them the most formidable defenses of the enemy are crumbling. I believe that when our D-day comes the same pattern will be followed, and the mighty Allied forces will join our brave, loyal countrymen in an epic victory.

But the forces of freedom will not land in the Philippines with guns and tanks alone. They will also bring with them food, medical supplies, and clothing which are so much needed by our suffering people. Thirty million pesos have already been set aside for the requisition of these supplies which will be sent to the front as soon as possible for distribution to our civilian population. As the war progresses and as more troops are landed in the Philippines, increasing quantities of these supplies will be made available. Philippine relief will be prompt and adequate.

As Philippine territory is wrested from the enemy, civil government will promptly follow military occupation so that the orderly processes of self-government may be established under the Constitution. Red Cross units, both Filipino and American, will follow the armies of freedom to help alleviate the sufferings of the people. Hospitals, health and puericulture centers will be reestablished. All the schools in operation before the war will be reopened in order to resume an education of patriotism, democracy, and humanitarianism.

The veterans of our wars for independence, and all those who supported our struggle for freedom, will receive for their labors and sacrifices the full recognition expected of a grateful nation. War widows and orphans will be provided for. Ample compensation will be made for the destruction of public and private properties. Roads and bridges destroyed by the enemy will be rebuilt. Disrupted communications by land, sea, and air, will be repaired and improved. Towns and cities which either were destroyed or suffered damages because of the war will be reconstructed under a systematic and scientific town-planning program. In this program, the towns of Bataan and Zanbales will receive preferential attention. Bataan, the historic battleground where our brave soldiers, Americans and Filipinos, faced the enemy until death, will be made a national shrine.

In providing for the reconstruction of our industries and the rehabilitation of our agriculture, immediate attention will be given to factory workers and farm hands throughout the Philippines, and full and generous assistance will be given to the small farmers who, because of the war, have lost with their nipa hut, their work animals and farm implements.

We are making preparations to meet the manifold problems arising from the closing and insolvency of our banks, insurance and credit institutions, the adulteration of our currency with unsound enemy issues, the impairment of the basis of taxation and the initial difficulty of tax collection. Moreover, we are formulating a long-range economic program with a view to securing that sound economic foundation which will give our independence stability and permanence.

In the gigantic task of rehabilitation and reconstruction, we are assured of America's full assistance and support. The joint Filipino-American Rehabilitation Commission, created by Congress, is already functioning. This Commission is under the chairmanship of a staunch friend of the Filipino people, Senator TYDINGS, of Maryland. To it is entrusted the task of studying and recommending to the United States and Philippine Governments measures calculated to secure the complete physical and economic rehabilitation of the Philippines and the reestablishment as soon as possible of such commercial relations between the two countries as will assure us a reasonable level of public and private prosperity.

In the preparation and execution of the Filipino rehabilitation program, America's support and assistance are essential. But there are responsibilities which we as a people must undertake ourselves, and which can be assumed only if we are faithful to our ideals, principles, and commitments.

We are a Christian people and the faith that we imbibed sprang from our contacts with nations of occidental civilization. We embraced Christianity a century before the Pilgrim Fathers landed at Plymouth. For more than 400 years we have kept that faith. We cannot now turn back and be a pagan people.

For centuries we have been a law-abiding people. We believe in and practice democracy. That is the reason why section 3, article II, of our Constitution provides that we renounce war as an instrument of national policy and adopt the generally accepted principles of international law as a part of the law of the Nation. It is repugnant to our Christian traditions and democratic ideals to be the satellite of a conquering power or to be allied with the masters of brute force, whether in Asia, Europe, or elsewhere.

The mutual relationship between the American and Filipino peoples for half a century has revealed to the Filipinos the high ideals of the American Nation and the good faith that has always animated the United States in its dealings with us. Out of this association have arisen mutual understanding and continuous cooperation between the two countries, resulting in great national progress for the Philippines—progress that is without parallel in history. In the epic of Bataan, where the American and Filipino soldiers fought together, the enduring friendship of our two peoples was sealed.

In this war between a free world and a slave world the Philippines has freely and voluntarily taken side with the defenders of liberty and democracy. In the same manner as the enemy is resorting to every means to attain his evil ends, the United Nations are exerting their utmost to achieve complete victory. Pledged in this war to the finish, we will continue doing our best to help the war effort. Every commitment made by us in this respect will be fulfilled.

The Filipino people, with their wisdom in peace and gallantry in war, have established their right to take a place in the family of nations as a full and sovereign member. We cannot renounce this right nor its obligations and responsibilities. We shall, as a free and self-respecting nation, fulfill our duties not only to ourselves but also to the entire freedom-loving world by participating in the establishment and preservation of a just peace for the benefit of mankind.

Our path of duty is clear. It is the path of national honor, dignity, and responsibility. It was laid out for us by the great heroes of our race—Rizal, Bonifacio, and Quezon. We shall move forward steadily to reach our goal, maintaining our faith in the United States and fully cooperating with her.

In the fulfillment of my duties as President of the Philippines, I ask in all humility but in all earnestness the cooperation of all my countrymen in the United States, Hawaii, in the homeland, and elsewhere in the world. With their full and unstinted cooperation and support, and God helping me, I shall not fail.

Regulations Governing the Operations of State Cooperating Agencies and Others Concerned With Title V of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following Veterans' Administration Instruction No. 1, title V, Public, No. 346, Seventy-eighth Congress, Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944:

REGULATIONS GOVERNING THE OPERATIONS OF STATE COOPERATING AGENCIES AND OTHERS CONCERNED WITH THE ADMINISTRATION OF TITLE V OF THE SERVICEMEN'S READJUSTMENT ACT OF 1944

1. Definitions: (A) "Act" means the Servicement's Readjustment Act of 1944, Public No. 346, Seventy-eighth Congress.

(B) "Administrator" means the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

(C) "Agency" means any agency administering a State unemployment compensation law or the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, which has entered into an agreement with the Administrator to assist him in the payment of allowances.

(D) "Allowance" means the readjustment allowance payable under the act.

(E) "Employment Office" means a public employment office which is utilized by the agency in administering its unemployment compensation law, and also means any facility designated as an employment office for the purposes of the Act by the Railroad Retirement Board.

(F) "Agent" means the readjustment allowance agent appointed by the Administrator under section 1100 (a) of the act, as his representative assigned to a given agency.

(G) "Value of remuneration other than cash," as used in this act, shall be determined by the agency pursuant to its rules and regulations as to such valuation under its unemployment compensation law.

2. Starting date of readjustment allowance payment: (A) With respect to agencies paying benefits on a flexible week basis, allowances for unemployment are first payable for the week starting Monday, September 4, 1944. With respect to agencies then paying benefits on a calendar week basis (i. e., the week beginning Sunday) the first week for which allowances may be paid starts September 10, 1944.

(B) Allowances for the self-employed are first payable for the month of October 1944.

(C) The allowance will be in the amount authorized in chapter IX of the act.

3. Applications for allowances: (A) The veteran's initial application shall be made through local offices or facilities of an agency on a form supplied by the Administrator. Applications may be made by mail pursuant to agency regulations and procedures.

(B) The veteran shall present his discharge or separation paper at the time of making his application whether such application is made in person or by mail.

(C) The agency may require any veteran who files an application and has no social-security account number to secure such a number.

4. Determination of entitlement: (A) When a veteran's discharge or separation paper specifies that the discharge or separation was honorable or dishonorable, the agency shall immediately determine his entitlement and enter its determination on the application form. A veteran's discharge or separation paper may have one of the following titles:

Honorable discharge.
Certificate of active service.
Certificate of service.
Certificate of discharge.
Discharge.
Certificate of unfavorable discharge.
Bad conduct discharge.
Dishonorable discharge.

When the veteran asserts that he has lost his paper; when the paper does not specify whether his discharge or separation was honorable or dishonorable; or when the facts stated in the paper are inconclusive, incomplete, or in dispute, his application shall be cleared with the Veterans' Administration through the agent.

(B) The agency shall determine the maximum number of weekly allowances to which the veteran is entitled.

(C) In determining the maximum number of weekly allowances potentially payable to the veteran, the agency shall, under section 900 (b), count "each calendar month or major fraction thereof of active service." For the purpose of such determination the term "calendar month" means the month starting with the date of the veteran's entry upon active service, and each such corresponding month ensuing consecutively thereafter. (I. e., the first "calendar month" starts on the beginning date of active service and ends on the day preceding the same date in the succeeding month; Provided, however, that if the succeeding month does not include enough days to have a corresponding date, his first "calendar month" will end at the close of such succeeding month. The second "calendar month" starts immediately after the end of the first "calendar month" and its termination is likewise determined, and so on with beginning and ending dates similarly determined.) When a fraction of such a month had elapsed on the veteran's discharge date, any balance of days remaining after the determination of calendar months as herein above described shall be treated as a major fraction if it includes 16 days or more.

(D) The period of active service is stated on some types of discharge or separation papers. All of the period between the veteran's entry upon active service and his discharge is active service. When the discharge does not show the date of entry into active service but does show the date of induction (or date of enlistment) the latter shall be accepted as date of entry into active service except as modified by other remarks on the reverse of the discharge paper.

(E) When a veteran files his first application for allowances the back of the veteran's discharge or separation paper shall be stamped or endorsed in ink with the following: "Application for readjustment allowances made through (name of agency) on (date)."

5. Registration for work and reporting unemployment: (A) Unemployed veterans shall be registered for work in accordance with the employment office regulations, policies, and procedures applicable to claimants under the unemployment compensation law of the agency.

(B) Unemployed veterans shall report their unemployment at such times and in such manner as is required by the agency for claimants under its unemployment compensation law.

(C) No unemployed veteran shall be eligible to receive an allowance for any week in which he was not so registered or with respect to which he did not so report; provided, that such failure to be registered or to report may be waived by the agency on the same basis as would justify such a waiver as to its unemployment-compensation claimants. Registration may be waived in case of illness as provided in paragraph 13.

6. Use of agency's type of week: Claims for allowances filed by unemployed veterans with a given agency shall be based on the weekly time unit which currently applies to claimants under the agency's unemployment-compensation law; provided, that any agency which applies other than a weekly time unit to unemployment-compensation claimants shall adopt suitable procedures to provide for a weekly basis for allowances to unemployed veterans.

7. Time and frequency of allowance payments: Allowances shall be paid at the intervals prescribed for unemployment-compensation payments by the law or regulations of the agency.

8. Required content of agency records: (A) Each agency shall maintain files containing all correspondence and other papers relating to individual veteran's claims, and such files shall be readily accessible to the agent, or other authorized representative of the Administrator.

(B) Each agency shall maintain a separate record for each veteran whose application is allowed. This record shall be maintained in such manner as will facilitate a prompt compilation of required statistical data and shall contain at least the following information:

(1) The veteran's name.

(2) His last service serial number, and branch of service.

(3) The date and place of the veteran's birth.

(4) The maximum number of weekly allowances to which the veteran was originally entitled.

(5) Number of weekly allowances paid, and total amount of weekly allowances paid during each consecutive period of unemployment.

(6) Number of monthly payments made to the self-employed and allowance weeks charged.

(7) Disqualifications imposed (current or past) and weeks involved.

(8) Record of transfer to or from another agency.

9. Required content of claims for total unemployment: (A) The initial, or additional first claim (i. e., the first claim taken after an intervening period of employment) filed by a veteran during any period of total unemployment shall contain a signed statement covering at least the following information:

(1) Residence.

(2) Ability and availability for work.

(3) Registration for work.

(4) Name of last employer.

(5) Reason for separation from last employer.

(6) Recent refusal of job offer or job referral.

(7) Recent failure to attend a free training course.

(B) Continued claims shall contain a signed statement covering at least the following information with respect to the week for which allowances is claimed:

(1) Ability and availability for work.

(2) Registration for work.

(3) Refusal of job offer or referral.

(4) Failure to attend free training courses.

(5) Wages earned.

(6) Benefits, received or accrued under other programs, which are deductible from allowances.

10. Allowance checks—Repayments, etc.: (A) Each agency shall supply its checks or other forms for payment of allowances in such form as is best suited to its own procedures and equipment, provided that the face of each such check (or order for payment) shall bear the following statement: "In payment for readjustment allowances under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944."

(B) Repayment to the agency of the amount of readjustment allowances paid veterans will be made promptly following receipt of certified voucher (Standard Form 1034) by the agent. Form 1034 will show the designation of the fund to be credited, the total amount to be repaid, the period covered, etc., and will be supported by a schedule or list of the individual items totaling the amount of the repayment claimed. This supporting schedule or list will contain the name of each veteran paid, his service serial number and the amount paid, and may be in the form of a copy of the check (or warrant) register or some similar product of the agency's accounting system.

(C) The amount of canceled checks and collections on account of items for which repayment has been made to the agency will be shown as a deduction from the amount stated on a subsequent Form 1034 and there will be attached a list of the checks canceled and the collections made.

(D) The agency will establish and maintain a separate depositary (banking) account for benefit payments under title V of the act and following each reconciliation of the account will furnish the agent a summary statement showing the balance at the beginning and end of the period, the total charges and total credits during the period, and the total of the checks outstanding at the end of the period.

11. Partial unemployment claims: (A) Each agency whose law provides for partial unemployment benefits shall take and pay veteran's claims for weeks of partial unemployment in a manner consistent with its methods under its unemployment compensation law.

(B) Any agency whose unemployment compensation law does not provide for the payment of partial unemployment benefits, shall provide for payment of veteran's partial unemployment benefits by adopting and putting into effect procedures which are insofar as practicable consistent with those of other agencies.

(C) Each agency's claim form for veteran's claims for weeks of partial unemployment shall contain a signed statement by the veteran covering the following information with respect to the week covered by the claim:

(1) Items 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, and 7 listed in subparagraph (A) of paragraph 9.

(2) Wages payable (i. e. earned).

(3) That work was for less than a full workweek.

(4) Reason for less than a full workweek.

12. Transfer of claims between agencies: (A) When a veteran, who has been receiving allowances through a given agency, transfers to the jurisdiction of another agency, he may continue his claims against the original agency under the interstate benefit payment plan (or, by direct mail with the consent of the original agency), or, at his option, he may request the new agency to have his allowance record transferred so that the new agency may pay his allowances.

(B) The form used by each agency for transferring a veteran's allowance record under subparagraph (a) shall contain the same minimum information specified under subparagraph (B) of paragraph 8.

13. Allowances during periods of illness or of disability: (A) Under the provisions of section 700 (b) (4) of the act, a period of continuous unemployment will be deemed to start on the effective date of the veteran's first claim for allowances during the period of continuous unemployment.

(B) Each agency shall initially, if practicable, secure evidence of the veteran's illness or disability through a certificate of his attending physician. The veteran's signed statement or other suitable evidence shall be obtained.

(C) So far as practicable, the agency shall assist the veteran in reporting weekly his continued unemployment, due to his illness or disability, by mail or through his designated representative.

(D) The first claim for allowance filed by a veteran for a period of illness or disability shall bear a signed statement by the veteran that he is unable to work and shall specify the nature of his illness or disability. Such claims shall also provide space for a physician's certification to the same effect, or for an explanation as to why such a certification could not practicably be secured.

(E) Continued claims for allowances filed by a veteran for a period of illness or disability under this regulation shall bear a signed statement by the veteran that he was unable to work throughout the week or weeks in question.

14. Allowances to the self-employed: (A) Each agency shall determine whether a veteran is engaged in self-employment, consistently with the definition of the employment relationship provided in its unemployment compensation law.

(B) A veteran shall be treated as having been fully engaged in self-employment during a given calendar month only if, throughout that month, he was engaged in his self-employment to the exclusion of any services in an employment relationship. For the purposes of this paragraph calendar month means one of the given 12 months of the calendar year.

(C) A veteran's net earnings from his self-employment include total income from self-employment less expenses incurred in securing such income. Personal or family expenditures shall not be deductible as expenses.

(D) Each self-employed individual shall maintain such records as are necessary for a determination of his net earnings. Such records shall reflect income received and expenses paid, and shall be open to inspection or audit by an authorized agency representative, or of the Veterans' Administration.

(E) Veterans' claims for allowances for months of self-employment shall be filed at a local office of the agency, or by mail on forms prescribed by the Administrator.

(F) Such claims shall be cleared through agency records, and the agency shall enter from the veteran's record, the maximum number of weeks of allowance which may be paid for the month in question. At the time of making such entry on the claim, the agency shall charge the claimant's record with payment of a monthly allowance (which shall be charged as the equivalent of 5 weekly allowances), subject to reversal of the charge, if the claim is subsequently disallowed.

(G) The agency shall deliver the claim, thus endorsed as to entitlement, to the agent, who shall examine the claim and either, disallow it, request further specified facts from the agency, or allow it and determine the veteran's net earnings and allowance payable for the month in question.

(H) If the agent disallows the claim, he shall so inform the agency. If he allows the claim, he shall secure payment thereof by appropriate notification to the nearest Treasury disbursing office.

(I) The agent's determination as to such claim shall be subject to review within the time set by the agency's law and regulations for the filing of appeals from initial determinations. The agent shall, when an application for review has been filed, conduct a recorded hearing and, based upon the record, issue his decision in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 18 (C).

15. Payment of claim after death: (A) In case a veteran dies, and at the time of his death there is due and payable to him readjustment allowances, the amount thereof shall, upon claim therefor, be certified to the agent. The agent shall forward such certification to the Dependents Claims Service, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C., for adjudication. The amount of such allowances shall be awarded under the provisions of R. & P. R-2660 (A) and (C) to the surviving spouse, or if there be no surviving spouse, to the child, or children, dependent mother or father, in the order named. In all other cases only so much of the unpaid allowances may be paid as may be necessary to reimburse a person who bore the expense of last illness and burial, provided that no part of the allowances due the deceased veteran shall be used to reimburse any political subdivision of the United States, or of any State, for expenses incurred in the veteran's last sickness or burial.

16. Agency application of disqualifications: Each agency shall take appropriate steps consistent with its established administrative policies, procedures, and precedent (disregarding the provision "attributable to the employer") to enforce and apply the disqualifications provided in the act. Each agency shall interpret and apply such disqualifications so far as practicable consistently with decisions of the agent on second appeal, and with decisions of the Administrator on final review.

17. Additional disqualifications: Pursuant to section 800 (c) (2) of the act, the Administrator hereby prescribes that each agency may apply the following additional disqualifications. In the case of successive (consecutive) disqualifications and the assessing of additional disqualifications (except as determined by the Administrator upon referral by the agency) the aggregate number of weeks to be assessed by the agency shall not exceed 13.

18. Determinations and appeals with respect to unemployment: (A) Each determination of the agency with respect to a veteran's application or claim shall be in writing and shall bear a clear statement of his right to appeal.

(B) Such determination shall be final unless within the time set by the agency's law and regulations for the filing of appeals from initial determinations an appeal is taken therefrom. Except as provided in this instruction such appeal shall be heard and decided by the same referee or tribunal which would hear and decide the appeal if it had arisen under the law of the agency. The hearing shall be conducted in accordance with the agency's law and regulations, in the same manner as are appeals from the agency's unemployment-compensation benefit determinations.

(C) Each decision of such referee or tribunal shall contain: The name of the agency whose determination is appealed; the name, most recent serial number, and last known address of the claimant; a complete statement of the case; findings of fact; conclusions of law; and the decision. Such decision shall be signed and dated.

(D) Unless an appeal is heard and decided by the referee or tribunal within 30 days after the date upon which the appeal was filed with the agency the claimant may make written application to the agent to have such appeal transferred to, and heard and decided by the agent. Upon receiving such application the agent may, if after consultation with the agency, he finds that such delay was unreasonable, order the appeal transferred to him for hearing and decision.

(E) The claimant shall be promptly notified of the referee's or tribunal's decision and such decision shall be final unless within 30 days after the date of mailing of notice to the claimant's last known address or in the absence of such mailing within 30 days after the delivery of such notice a written appeal pursuant to section 1102 of the act is filed with the agency, the referee or tribunal, or the agent.

(F) When such appeal is filed the record shall be transmitted to the agent. Upon such agent's request he shall be furnished with a transcript of the hearing on appeal.

(G) Interstate appeal proceedings shall be conducted in accordance with the law and regulations of the agency conducting the hearing and appeal.

(H) The phrase in section 1103 of the act, "the appellate procedures being subject to final appeal to the Administrator" is hereby construed to mean "the appellate proceeding and the decision being subject to final appeal to the Administrator."

(I) For the purpose of this instruction the veteran shall be deemed to be the only interested party, other than the United States, except that in cases involving a strike, lock-out, or other labor dispute the employer shall be deemed to be an interested party.

(J) Any appeal to the Administrator from the decision of the agent must be made in writing within 60 days from the date of mailing of notice of decision to last known address of the veteran.

19. Prosecutions and penalties. In case an agency discovers an apparent violation of the act, subject to penalty under section 1300 or 1301, the agency shall report the relevant facts to the agent, who will be responsible for further proceedings.

20. Force of instructions on forms. The Administrator's instructions appearing on forms supplied by him under this instruction shall have the same force and effect as if they were set out in full in this instruction.

21. Statistical reports. Each agency shall report to the agent promptly after the close of each calendar week the number of veterans who, during that week, were paid allowances by the agency on account of unemployment, the total amount so paid, and the number of veterans whose entitlement expired during the week. The agency shall furnish such other reports or information which the Administrator finds necessary. It will be the policy of the Administrator, where feasible, to consult with the agencies before requiring additional statistical reports.

22. Individual reports. Each agency shall, with respect to each veteran whose right to benefits has been exhausted or has expired, or whose record has been transferred to another agency, or at intervals as prescribed by the Administrator, report the following information on forms supplied by the Administrator.

(1) The name of the veteran.

(2) His serial number and branch of service.

(3) Total number of weekly allowances and amount paid during each consecutive period of unemployment and the beginning and ending dates thereof.

FRANK T. HINES,
Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

Well Earned

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 7, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the Boston Post of August 31 pays the following editorial tribute to the officers and men of the United States merchant marine:

WELL EARNED

Well deserved are the new war awards authorized by the President for the men of the United States merchant marine. A ribbon bar has been created for gallantry as well as a medal for meritorious service and a plaque for any ship cited for distinguished service. The merchant officers and sailors have been in the thick of this war from the start, first by braving submarines and enemy aircraft to get vital supplies across the two oceans, and more recently by taking part in the invasions which opened the big Allied offensives. They deserve official recognition.

Federal Assistance to States for Public Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 8 (legislative day of Friday, September 1), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix an address by Dr. Howard A. Dawson before the Representative Assembly of the National Education Association dealing with pending legislation on the subject of Federal assistance to the States for public education.

In this connection I would also like to call attention to that part of article V of the platform of the Democratic Party dealing with education adopted by the Democratic National Convention, 1944, which is as follows:

We favor Federal aid to education, administered by the States without interference by the Federal Government.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CURRENT BATTLE FOR THE PEOPLE'S SCHOOLS

Fortunately, the teaching profession is not under regimentation, political or military. We are free to put on whatever kind of fight we think is necessary for the benefit of the cause of public education and against those who we think are against that cause.

Recently I heard the story of a colonel who stepped on the captain's sore toe. The captain kicked the colonel's shins. The colonel reciprocated by kicking the captain's shins. A private was standing nearby and saw what was going on. He proceeded to kick the shins of both the colonel and the captain.

A military investigation followed. The colonel explained that he had rather awkwardly stepped on the captain's toes. He was sorry and offered to apologize. The captain explained that indeed his toe was very sore, that the pain was so excruciating he did not have time to take a second thought, that he had impolitely kicked the colonel's shins, that he was sorry and offered apologies. But the court wanted to know from the private why he entered the melee. Said the private: "Your Honor, please, that is very simple. When I saw the captain kick the colonel, I thought the gol-darned war was over."

Some people seem to think that whenever they want to they can kick the shins of the organized teaching profession. They are mistaken. The war against the enemies of public education is perpetually on.

No institution of the people of America has made so great a contribution to the preservation of freedom, to economic progress, and to security among men as the public school. The foundations of the knowledge, skill, character, morale, and patriotism of this generation of young Americans have been laid in classrooms of American schools. There may be measures of shortcomings, but the full measure of their character, skill, and devotion has been demonstrated from Bataan and Corregidor to Bizerte and Anzio to the Normandy Peninsula. No defense of our schools beyond these demonstrations of skill and devotion by the products of schools is needed in this critical hour of American history.

Public education has long since demonstrated its essentiality to the winning of the war. The public-school teachers, who, by the Philistines, the enemies of the children of light, have been charged in the halls of Congress with seeking selfish advantages in asking for living wages, have long since demonstrated that the services they have rendered to the youth of the Nation in the dark days of economic depression and public neglect are the foundation of military victory on the far-flung battlefields of the earth.

If we know anything at all, we know that an army for the defense of the bulwarks of democracy and freedom cannot be fought by illiterates. We do not know the full extent of the number of men who have been rejected for military service because of lack of educational qualifications, but we do know that up until about a year ago 2,997,000 men between the ages of 18 and 44 years had been rejected because of physical, moral, and educational deficiencies. Nearly a third of these men were physically fit and otherwise qualified except for practical purposes they were illiterates.

Illiteracy and near-illiteracy are the products of neglect in past years and must be stopped at their source. They can be stopped only by giving an American standard of educational opportunity to all of the children of the people of America.

The Nation has never undertaken any such program. For the most part the blessings of education to our national preservation are not the products of any demonstrated interest of the United States Government in the education of the masses of the people. For generations too many of the representatives of the American people, like the swine who fatten on the acorns from the mighty oak, never look above to see from whence their blessings have come.

The public schools of this Nation have been in the midst of a crisis for some months. During the last 2 years 360,000 teachers were new to their jobs. In all there are only about 900,000 school teachers in a normal year.

With nearly 70,000 teachers entering the military service during the last 2 years, and about 62,000 entering industry and similar nonteaching employment, with some 13,000 classrooms vacant because teachers could not be found, and some 17,000 teaching positions abolished as a result of overcrowding classes, abolishing subjects and closing schools, and with over 50,000 teachers teaching on emergency certificates, no further evidence of the crisis in education should be needed.

The origin of the crisis in education is not a shortage of qualified persons to teach school; the shortage is in the funds to pay living wages to teachers so as to meet the competition of the Federal Government and of private industry. Last year 254,000 teachers were being paid less than $1,200 per year; 44,000 received less than $600. Last year the annual average salary of all teachers was $1,507, while for rural teachers it was only $967. Their salaries can be compared with the annual salaries of Federal Government employees, excluding military personnel, $2,235; employees in manufacturing industries, $2,363.

The cost of living has increased during the war period 23 percent in cities and 38 percent in rural areas, but teachers' salaries have increased on the average only 8 percent.

School teachers are the largest class of employees engaged in an enterprise essential to the winning of the war and the peace for whom the Federal Government has done nothing to adjust their salaries to meet the current cost of living. The Congress has increased the pay of Federal employees by about 25 percent. The increase of more than 80 percent in the wages and salaries in manufacturing has been paid almost entirely by the Federal Government, since most of the industries are engaged in production for the Government under war contracts. The Government in making war contracts takes into consideration the cost of wages, has the power and the machinery to fix wages, and guarantees the entrepreneur at least 6 percent profit.

The facts as to the inequalities of educational opportunity among the States of this Union are too well known to need repetition here. It is a known and irrefutable fact that the inequalities and lack of educational opportunity are not due to lack of interest or effort on the part of the communities and States where educational opportunity is least. Only an intolerable bigot or an economic ignoramus would any longer argue that a long-range program of adequate educational opportunity for all American children and youth is merely a matter of the States placing their fiscal houses in order.

The inequalities of educational opportunity are due to the insuperable differences in economic ability of the several States and to the differences in the number of children in proportion to the adult population. As a Nation we are spending the most money for education where there are the fewest children, and on children who in turn will have the fewest children. As a policy for a democratic nation we are fast pursuing cultural, economic, and political suicide.

For years we have endeavored to secure a policy of national contribution to supplement State and local effort to support a standard of educational opportunity adequate to national security and prosperity. Those efforts have as a final result proved of no avail.

Unfortunately, in the Halls of the United States Congress there has for years been a selfish and unenlightened minority who both by accident and carefully nurtured machination and design have been able to prevent the cause of the public schools coming to a fair vote in the Nation's legislative assembly.

Those minority enemies are still in power. It remains to be seen whether a united teaching profession can yield a democratic influence sufficiently strong to produce a genuine expression of majority opinion.

When I make the statement that there are powerful enemies to the cause of education sitting in the Halls of the United States Congress, it becomes an easy matter to cite the evidence. Among the individual saboteurs of public education is the Senator from Ohio, Mr. TAFT. His opening statement in the debate on the Federal aid bill last October was to this effect: "This is a revolutionary proposal, probably the most revolutionary ever made in the Congress of the United States. It does not relate to the war effort. There is nothing that can be done to education that even in the remotest way would contribute to the winning of the war. Nothing we can do about education will in any way affect the conduct of the war."

Senator MILLIKIN, of Colorado, tossed a challenge to teachers not only of his own State, but of the entire Nation when he said, "I have not had a single request from the rank and file of the people of Colorado to support the bill. Every request I have received has come from the teaching profession."

Then, to make clear his disbelief, the Senator from Colorado added that the 1,000,000 men rejected from military service because of educational deficiencies were for the most part all morons and incapable of receiving education.

It is disappointing that those of us in the educational fraternity have not sufficiently impressed the cause of public education upon the layman constituency and the parents of the children to cause a spontaneous outburst of support for a piece of legislation such as we had before the Congress last October.

For years the House Committee on Education has been deliberately filled by a minority known to be enemies of public education. The situation is no different now, although we have had some very stanch friends on the committee.

I wonder if those who are listening to me realize that there has been only one time, so far as I have been able to find in the written history of the United States Congress, when a major educational bill for the benefit of the masses of the people through the public schools has ever been approved by the House Committee on Education?

In 1917, when the Smith-Hughes bill was enacted, it became necessary for the House itself to take the bill away from the committee, although the chairman of the committee was the author of the bill. We are now in a somewhat similar position with respect to the Ramspeck bill. Fortunately, the Congress has provided a democratic means by which the Members of Congress can overcome the handicap of being blocked by a committee that deliberately undertakes to thwart the will of the majority. This method is known as a motion to discharge the committee. It is a thoroughly democratic method that has been provided by the House itself as one of its rules of operation.

My friends, you will find Congressmen who will tell you that they do not believe in that method of handling legislation in Congress. The answer is that if it is not the proper method, then a majority of the Congress ought to vote to repeal it. As long as it is the democratic official method of handling legislation, there is certainly nothing unbecoming in any Congressman signing a petition to discharge the House Committee on Education, which has now had the bill before it for more than 12 months, and which, although having voted to have a hearing, has continuously postponed action from time to time. Furthermore, it is the solemn duty of the organized teaching profession and of all friends of the schools to urge Congressmen to use this legislative procedure in behalf of the American children.

The fight is on. It is up to us. Do we expect to continue to take a licking lying down or as American citizens do we assume the responsibility of fighting back for the schools of the people's children?

It behooves every one of us when he returns to his home to contact his Congressman, to urge him to sign this discharge motion as soon as the Congress reconvenes. It becomes a duty of each of us to inform the lay constituency of the schools of the situation and have them contact their Congressmen. The time is now. It is not after Labor Day. It will not be after the election in November. After the schools open in September, there will be hundreds of thousands of children victimized every day and every hour by the national neglect of the cause of the public schools.

We have powerful friends in the Congress. I would have you remember that one of the great friends of the cause of public education is Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS, of Utah, and that he is up for election again in that great State.

It is the duty of every school teacher and every true friend of the schools in Utah to see that Senator THOMAS comes back to Congress to lead the fight for education.

My friends, we have recently had some demonstrations of the power of the influence of teachers working in a righteous cause. It was no accident that LISTER HILL returned to the Senate in the Alabama election. An overwhelming majority of the school teachers of Alabama went all out for Mr. HILL. The result speaks for itself.

It was no political accident that CLAUDE PEPPER will again sit in the Halls of the United States Senate to lead the fight for the common people of Florida and of the Nation. The school teachers of that State made their contribution. In the primary election of that State, Federal aid was an issue; Federal aid won.

Again, my friends, it is no political accident that that not-so-distinguished Republican Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN] will not again grace the Halls of Congress.

The power of the organized teaching profession has but begun to find expression and I predict that before next November 7 there will be many people in the Nation aware that the school children of America have a voice of justice and equity as well as a voice of power and of influence.

In these United States of ours, we believe in the democratic doctrine of equality of opportunity. We believe that if by public processes and private belief and practice, we can keep the doors of opportunity open to all Americans, rewards in our economic system will tend to be distributed somewhat according to merit. So long as we subscribe to that political and economic philosophy there is no choice for us as a democratic Nation, except to make large investments of our economic resources to keep the doors of opportunity open to American youth. These doors can be successfully kept open only by a universal system of free public education. For these reasons, I believe that an action by the United States Congress giving Federal aid to the States for the support of public schools will strengthen the faith of the American people in the long future of American democracy.

The question is, "What will you do about it?"

The Government's Suit Against the Railroads

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 8 (legislative day of Friday, September 1), 1944

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a letter written by Assistant Attorney General Wendell Berge, published in the New York Times of August 30, 1944. The letter deals with an important subject, but it seems to me in many places to show a misunderstanding of the fixing of rates by railroads. In the letter Mr. Berge explains something concerning the suit instituted by the Government to prohibit the railroads from violating the Sherman Antitrust Act in the matter of fixing of railroad rates.

In connection with Mr. Berge's letter I ask also to have printed in the RECORD, an editorial from the Minneapolis Tribune of October 22, 1943, which deals largely with the same subject discussed in Mr. Berge's letter.

There being no objection, the letter and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of Augut 30, 1944]

LETTERS TO THE TIMES

SUIT AGAINST ROADS DEFENDED—ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL HOLDS THEY VIOLATED ANTITRUST ACT

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Your editorial today concerning the antitrust suit against the railroad conveys an inaccurate impression about the procedure for establishing lawful rates, and I think it should be corrected. At one point you state that "railroad rates for more than half a century have been fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission," and at another point you state that "it is obvious that we must choose between Government-regulated rates—the policy evolved through the last half century—or free competitive rates adopted by each railroad."

From your statements it would appear that the scheme of regulation which this country has adopted provides that all rates are to be fixed by the regulatory authority, and that competition is incompatible with the type of regulation provided by law. The fact is, however, that under existing law the railroads themselves initiate the rates by filing proposed rate schedules with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and when rates are thus filed they become effective after 30 days unless suspended by order of the Commission. The Commission may undertake such an inquiry either on complaint or on its own motion. The law does not contemplate that the commission shall review the reasonableness of all rates filed, nor, indeed, would that be physically possible. The Supreme Court has expressly held that the Interstate Commerce Act "did not take from the carriers their power to initiate rates—that is, the power in the first instance to fix rates, or to increase or to reduce them" (Arizona Grocery Co. v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway, 284 U. S. 370, 384).

Few rates reviewed

Actually, something less than 1 percent of the rates filed are subsequently reviewed by the Commission. This is entirely consistent with the spirit and purpose of the Interstate Commerce Act, which is to leave the primary function of rate making with the individual railroads themselves, confining Commission inquiry to cases where the Commission has reason to question the propriety of the rate initiated by the railroad.

But this procedure obviously does not exclude the application of the antitrust laws. If railroads act collusively in the initiation of rates, or through agreements bring organized coercion on particular railroads in regard to their rates or other practices, then the antitrust laws apply just as they do to any other field of business. There is nothing in the Interstate Commerce Act which authorizes railroads to agree among themselves to file noncompeting rates for the same or similar services, nor is there anything in the act which otherwise exempts them from the antitrust laws in this connection.

The coordinate application of the Sherman Act and the Interstate Commerce Act is clear. The Sherman Act requires the rates which are filed to be noncollusive; the Interstate Commerce Act provides for a commission wise competitive. The suit in no way involves with power to rectify rates which are otherjoint through rates.

The Supreme Court has held that "the Anti-Trust Act applies to railroads" (United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U. S. 290, 341) and that "the Commission has no power to enforce the Sherman Act as such" (McLean Trucking Company v. United States, 321 U. S. 67, 79).

Collusion is charged

It has also, of course, been held time and again that price-fixing agreements between competitors are per se illegal under the antitrust laws, irrespective of the reasonableness of the prices (United States v. Socony Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, 223). Thus, charges that the railroads act collusively in the initiation of rates, or that they make agreements to prevent individual railroads from initiating lower rates or competing in regard to services, involve violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

You state that we must choose between Government-regulated rates or free competitive rates. I do not think that there is any such issue before us, and certainly no such issue is raised by the recent antitrust suit. The framework of our present scheme of regulation contemplates freedom on the part of individual carriers to act independently in the initiation of rates. That is the way we want to keep it, and the antitrust laws step in when the railroads through combination or agreement try to interfere with that freedom. That is what the present antitrust suit is about and it involves no new principle.

There is no way by which the Interstate Commerce Commission can act to keep railroads from organizing to prevent each other from initiating lower rates. The Interstate Commerce Act is silent on combinations and agreements of this sort, and if it undertook to prohibit them the prohibitions would be mere unnecessary repetition of the provisions of the Sherman Act.

The merits of the particular allegations of the Government's complaint will be thoroughly presented to the court in due course. But it did seem to me that what appears to be a fundamental misconception as to our system of rate regulation and its relation to the antitrust laws ought to be corrected now.

WENDELL BERGE,
Assistant Attorney General.

WASHINGTON, August 25, 1944.

[From the Minneapolis Morning Tribune of October 22, 1943]

LOOK HOMEWARD, MR. W.

In his new role as No. 1 lambaster for the New Deal, Vice President WALLACE made a two-fisted attack at Dallas Wednesday night on the developing transportation monopoly in this country.

Mr. WALLACE says "plunderers," who, he asserts, are inspired by Wall Street, seek to seize control of new forms of transportation in order to establish monopolistic control over all rail, motor, water, and air transportation. He predicts that unless Congress is on its guard to fight transportation monopoly whenever "this Wall Street inspired creature lifts its ugly head in Washington," the public will insist on public ownership of all transportation.

Whether we accept the Vice President's major premise that this "creature" is nurtured solely by Wall Street, it is clear that the whole trend has been to increase and not to lighten the cost of transportation to business and agriculture.

State and Federal governments have spent vast sums of public money to build highways and waterways in order that people might have cheap, quick transportation. Now the people's money is being spent on a scale never before known to develop air transportation. Yet despite the great public interest represented by these expenditures, the benefits of cheaper and more efficient means of transportation are not accruing in full measure to the consumer.

Why?

Wall Street?

Surely, Mr. WALLACE is too intelligent to be satisfied in his own mind with so oversimplified an explanation of a serious problem.

If transportation monopoly is withholding from the people the full benefit of their investment, whose fault is it?

The clear answer is that it is the responsibility of the Government—which means, during the last decade, the Roosevelt administration, of which Mr. WALLACE is a part.

With the exception of the Attorney General's office which is now endeavoring to prevent legalization of the monopolistic set-up of rate bureaus, the record of the Roosevelt administration has been one that makes bigger and better transportation monopolies inevitable. If Mr. WALLACE were frank he would point out that the White House has not merely failed to prevent the transportation monopoly, to which Mr. WALLACE calls attention, but has actually abetted it.

The benefits of cheaper and more efficient means of transportation are not fully accruing to the people because Government regulation of interstate commerce has ceased to perform the function for which it was created. The Interstate Commerce Act was passed in 1887 to protect the people against extortionate rail rates, unjust discrimination, and undue preferences. With the passage of the Esch-Cummings Act in 1920, this purpose was sidetracked and regulation began to concern itself largely with insuring a fair return to the railroads.

What was begun under the Esch-Cummings Act was carried to its full fruition under the leadership and during the administration of President Roosevelt. The Motor Carrier Act of 1935, the Guffey coal bill and the Transportation Act of 1940 all set the stage for the very dangers Vice President Wallace now sees staring us in the face.

The Transportation Act of 1940, which placed all forms of transportation except air transport under I. C. C. regulation, was President Roosevelt's own answer to the transportation problem. This act amplified by the Guffey Act, has within itself the machinery to produce the monopolistic ogre now haunting the dreams of the No. 2 man in the administration which fathered it.

Small wonder that the only answer Mr. Wallace can discover is a threat of that Frankenstein of all monopolies — public ownership.

The annual transportation bill of the American people is estimated to be $20,000,000,000. Today half of this bill is paid by the Government—by you as a taxpayer.

Anything that reduces this cost without interfering with the efficiency of service directly benefits every farmer, businessman, and manufacturer.

The prosperity and the development of Minnesota and the upper Mississippi Valley depend directly upon the availability of low-cost, efficient transportation of all kinds.

For decades we have ben promised relief from high and discriminatory rates. No administration has been more vociferous in those promises than Mr. Roosevelt's.

What has been the result?

The Motor Carrier Act and higher truck rates.

The Guffey Act and higher priced coal. The Transportation Act of 1940 and the leveling of all transportation rates at more uniform and higher levels.

If Vice President WALLACE is sincerely concerned about the dangers of a transportation monopoly he should do some work in the White House backyard, and address his talents and his voice to the administration of which he is a part.

The Government's Suit Against the Railroads

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 8 (legislative day of Friday, September 1), 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, the antitrust suit recently filed by the Justice Department against the railroads has caused widespread consternation among those who are planning the railroad program for the post-war period. While Congress is concerning itself with reconversion legislation, the Justice Department is making it impossible for our great railroad transportation systems to plan for peacetime conversion with any assurance, and for that reason, among many others, it is most unfortunate.

In this connection I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial published in the New York Times of August 25, designated A Political Suit?; and a second editorial from the New York Times under date of August 30, and also a story appearing in the Wyoming State Tribune of August 29 headlined "Jeffers wants Roosevelt as suit witness." I had intended to ask that a letter written by Assistant Attorney General Wendell Berge to the New York Times be published in the RECORD, but the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has previously asked that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters and newspaper article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of August 25, 1944]

A POLITICAL SUIT?

The antitrust suit filed by the Department of Justice against 47 railroads, J. P. Morgan & Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co. has all the earmarks of a political move in the Democratic election campaign. It certainly does not seem to make sense on any other interpretation.

The railroads concerned are accused of collusion in fixing rates or in refusing to reduce rates. Everyone with even an elementary acquaintance with the subject knows that railroad rates for more than half a century have been fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, not by the railroads, and that the Commission has power to fix minimum rates as well as maximum rates. Not a single railroad rate in the United States can be fixed with the Commission's disapproval. When the Department of Justice attacks railroad rates, therefore, it is attacking either the integrity or the competence of the Government's own I. C. C. Is this what the Department of Justice means to do?

The Department of Justice accuses the railroads of fixing unfair rates for Western shippers as compared with Eastern shippers. This looks as if one branch of the administration were trying to assure the Western farmers that its heart was on their side. But if there is any discrimination in railroad rates against the West and in favor of the East (which may be seriously doubted), it is there because the Interstate Commerce Commission put it there. That Commission, moreover, has full power to remove it. This charge about eastern and western rates is ancient and stale. It can only serve to stir up section economic animosity.

Possibly because it recognizes how feeble its accusation about railroad rates will sound to intelligent voters in view of the known facts, the Department of Justice accuses the railroads of collusion also in discouraging improvements in service and equipment. It talks of delays in the installation of air-conditioning equipment. Does the Department expect that in wartime, when every man and machine is needed for the war effort, there ought to be a diversion of manpower and materials to turn out air-conditioned railroad cars? On the question of basic wartime service the record of the railroads speaks for itself. In the last war, under direct Government operation, the railroads of the country increased their ton-mile performance from 1916 to 1918 only 12 percent. In the present war, under private management and voluntary collaboration, railroad ton-miles increased from 1941 to 1943 by 53 percent, and are still rising. Further, where passenger traffic on the railroads increased only 23 percent from 1916 to 1918, it increased between 1941 and 1943 by 200 percent, and is still going up. There has been no serious congestion, as in the last war. If all this is the result of "conspiracy" and "collusion," we might ask for more of it.

The Department of Justice's suit sounds like a revival of all the favorite political targets of approximately 1912. It would not have been the perfect specimen it is of that period if it had not dragged in the names of J. P. Morgan & Co. and Kuhn, Loeb & Co. As neither bankers nor railroads can make a move today without the approval of either the I. C. C. or the S. E. C., the Department of Justice must once more be attacking the competence of another governmental agency.

On the general principle involved, it is obvious that we must choose between Government-regulated rates—the policy evolved through the last half century—or free competitive rates adopted by each railroad. It was the latter system that led to regulated rates. But we cannot have it both ways. And if there is to be a change of policy the proper body to adopt that change is Congress, not Mr. Berge or Mr. Biddle.

If the Department of Justice's suit were suspicious on no other ground, it would be so on that of its timing. It is filed in the midst of a Presidential campaign, with the election less than 3 months away. But Mr. Berge is himself quoted as saying that under any circumstances 6 to 12 months will intervene before the hearings begin in court. The railroads, in other words, will have no legal opportunity to answer the charges until after the election has passed.

[From the New York Times of August 30, 1944]

MORE ON THE RAILROAD SUIT

Elsewhere on this page we publish a letter from Wendell Berge, the Assistant Attorney General, taking issue with our editorial on the suit filed by the Department of Justice a few days ago against 47 railroads and 2 banking houses.

Our editorial declared that "railroad rates for more than half a century have been fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, not by the railroads, and that the Commission has power to fix minimum rates as well as maximum rates. Not a single railroad rate in the United States can be fixed with the Commission's disapproval." This is the essential situation. Regardless of the technical forms of procedure, it is the I. C. C. which to all practical intents and purposes, through its complete power of approval or disapproval, fixes railroad rates.

There are approximately 20,000 classifications of articles, and it is necessary to have published and on file a rate covering possible movement of any one of them from any one to any other one of approximately 75,000 freight stations. That is why the detailed freight-rate structure must be left to the railroads. But the Commission fixes the basic rates which control all the others.

The Commission acts, moreover, not only on the initiative of the railroads, but on the initiative of shippers and on its own initiative. In 1936, for example, to take one especially prominent example, it ordered all the eastern railroads, against their protests, to reduce their passenger fares from 3.6 cents a mile to 2 cents a mile. The Commission has always used its own judgment on the general level of freight rates and on the relationship of rates.

This brings us to the general issue raised by Mr. Berge in his letter and by the Department of Justice in its suit. What is clearly involved here is a question of basic governmental policy. The antitrust suit of the Department of Justice runs head on against the interpretation of the law that has been held by the Interstate Commerce Commission. This may be illustrated in the 15 percent case decided on October 20, 1931. The I. C. C. then declared:

"The records show that in the past decade the railroads have made great strides in improving their service and at the same time operating with greater efficiency and economy. But what they have done * * * has been characterized by continual intensifying of their own competition. At a time when as an industry they have new enemies to face, their warfare with each other has grown more bitter, so that economies in operation have been offset in part by the growth of competitive waste.

"All this is contrary to the spirit of the Transportation Act of 1920. Congress then looked beyond the individual railroad to the concept of a national transportation system. It pointed the way, in the consolidation provisions, to the reduction of competitive wastes. It went to the extreme of removing the barriers of restrictive Federal and State antitrust legislation which might otherwise stand in the way.

"Short of consolidations, it opened wide the door to agreements for the pooling of service and of revenue, whenever it could be shown to our satisfaction that such agreements were in the public interest.

"Much has been accomplished in the way of unification, but much remains to be done, and the pooling provisions of the law stand almost unused. Further progress along the lines pointed out by Congress will aid in bringing about the cooperation which is essential to railroad salvation."

This view was reiterated and supplemented before a Senate committee in June of last year by the late Joseph B. Eastman, who had been for many years a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission and was at the time of testifying Director of the Office of Defense Transportation. Such complaint as there was about the rate-making machinery of the transportation industry of the country had its source, Mr. Eastman declared, "not in the shippers of the country but in the lawyers and economists of the Department of Justice." "It must be evident to any reasonable man," he said, "that the carriers cannot respond to all the duties imposed by law if each individual carrier acts in a vacuum. It is a situation, under all conditions, which plainly calls for consultation, conference, and organization and for many acts of a joint or cooperative character. * * * For my own part, I have no doubt whatever that organizations of the carriers * * * in general serve a very useful purpose and are desirable in the public interest."

Referring to the so-called western commissioner agreement, on which the present suit of the Department of Justice is based, Mr. Eastman remarked that he had known of that agreement at the time it was formulated, that he was convinced "it had no sinister purpose," and that there "never was any secret about it." Saying that, in his judgment, the plan never accomplished much, he added that he sympathized with its general idea—that is, "to put a brake upon competitive waste and extravagance." Incidentally, he remarked, in the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act of 1938, the carriers were enjoined to create such committees. Mr. Eastman concluded that the railroads, in order to fulfill the duties and obligations imposed on them by the Interstate Commerce Act, "must be in a position to consult, confer, and deal collectively."

These statements of the Commission and of Mr. Eastman make one thing clear. Either the present suit of the Department of Justice is an attack upon the integrity or the competence of the Government's own I. C. C. to perform the work assigned to it, or the Department of Justice is seeking to reverse the long-established policy of rate-making that has the approval of Congress. It is folly for one agency of the Government to sue the railroads for actions which another agency of the Government has encouraged them to take. The Department of Justice should take its case to Congress, not to the courts.

JEFFERS WANTS ROOSEVELT AS SUIT WITNESS—ANTITRUST ACTION SAID ATTEMPT TO WIPE OUT I. C. C.

LOS ANGELES.—W. M. Jeffers, president of the Union Pacific, declared today that antitrust charges against western railroads seek the elimination of the Interstate Commerce Commission and that as one of the parties to the action he would like to have "none other than President Roosevelt as a witness."

Jeffers referred to an address made by President Roosevelt at Salt Lake City in 1932, when he was seeking his first term as Chief Executive. President Roosevelt's address was a commendation of the supervision of the railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission. At that time Roosevelt said, in part:

"But as the railroads have been allowed to increase their capacity far beyond traffic needs, the wastes of competition have become more and more insupportable. Now we face the issues: shall we permit them—in fact, force them—to bankrupt each other? Or shall we permit them to consolidate and so to economize through reducing unprofitable services?

"Nearly $5,000,000,000 (of railroad bonds) are owned by savings banks and insurance companies—which means that they are owned by the millions of policy holders and savings-bank depositors.

"When you put money in the bank or pay that insurance premium you are buying an interest in the railroads. Some two billions more are held by churches, hospitals, charitable organizations, colleges, and similar institutions, as endowments. Even railroad stocks are held in small units of a few shares, here and there, by school teachers, doctors, salesmen, thrifty workmen.

"Regulation, in fact, has protected investors as well as patrons and I think that no enlightened railroad man would care to go back to the old days when unregulated railroad operation landed one-third of the railroad mileage in receivership."

MADE POSSIBLE RISE OF WEST

"I believe the policy of enforced competition between railroads can be carried to unnecessary lengths. * * * The railroad mesh is the warp on which our economic web is largely fashioned. It has made a continent into a Nation. It has saved us from splitting, like Europe, into small clashing units. It has made possible the rise of the West. It is our service of supply."

The antitrust action, Jeffers said, aims to bring about the very things the President believed should be avoided.

At a press conference after his arrival in Los Angeles today, Jeffers explained to newspapermen that the action taken by Attorney General Francis Biddle and Assistant Attorney General Wendell Berge would have the effect of eliminating the Interstate Commerce Commission and returning the railroads to cut-throat competition which would bring chaos to the industry and to the West.

"It is a matter of common knowledge," Jeffers told newsmen, "that the conspiracy suit is purely political. On the basis of the amazing job the railroads have done in the war effort I think it will eventually occur to Berge and Biddle before election rolls around that it is poor politics.

"The charges lead me to believe that these young men in the Attorney General's office are seeking the elimination of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the transfer of its duties to the Department of Justice. This would tear down what has taken more than 50 years to build.

"No industry is as rigidly supervised as the railroads. Every activity in which the railroads engage is subject to review and approval or disapproval by the Interstate Commerce Commission—and properly so. The Commission has done a remarkable job. It is nonpartisan and nonsectional."

Referring to Roosevelt's 1932 address in Salt Lake City, Jeffers said:

"I don't think there ever was a clearer exposition made of the railroads in this country than Mr. Roosevelt made then. If Mr. Roosevelt was right then—and he was—then Berge and Biddle are wrong now.

"I should think both Berge and Biddle would want to study the President's speech, because they would find all the answers to their charges.

"Everything railroads have done literally conforms to what the President said in that speech. Inasmuch as I am one of the railroad men named as a party to the suit, I would be glad to have none other than Mr. Roosevelt for my witness."

The Union Pacific executive reminded reporters of a recent statement by Col. J. Monroe Johnson, Director of the Office of Defense Transportation. "Colonel Johnson," Jeffers told newsmen, "has said that the best war job is being done by the railroads, and he didn't except the armed services. Johnson appreciates the efforts the railroads are making."

Jeffers said the land-grant rate law, which would be repealed by a House bill now before the Senate for approval, may cost the railroads from three hundred to five hundred million dollars after the war. This is a probability because the Government, which is entitled to a 50-percent reduction on much of the freight hauled, may decide that certain tariffs charged as commercial traffic should have been charged at land-grant rates.

"The Government will tell us we charged a commercial rate when a land-grant rate should have applied and will deduct the amount from what we have coming. We have no recourse. Inasmuch as the Government accountants are 2 years behind in their work, the railroads will be faced with a three hundred to five hundred million dollar kickback."

Education for World Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 8 (legislative day of Friday, September 1), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Education for World Affairs—Basis for an Understanding Peace," delivered by Dr. William M. Hepburn, dean of the law school of the University of Alabama, at the summer school graduation exercises on August 25, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When the war is over, peace is not likely to last unless the American people have a hand in making it and understand it. The schools of America must help the American people to make and keep an understanding peace.

Fourteen months ago the Birmingham Age-Herald published an editorial called A People's Peace, concluding:

"Is it possible that there is entrenched in the Senate enough isolationist strength to thwart the clear wishes of the American people? Such a suggestion would stir all believers in world collaboration into crusading action. * * * It is growing plainer every moment that if we are to have a real peace it will have to be a people's peace." [1]

A peace based on the informed understanding of the American people would probably be unique. I doubt whether there has ever been a people's peace—a peace of understanding among the American people, of understanding by us of other peoples.

In the regulation of human affairs two institutions stand out as successes, one as our saddest failure. The successes are popular government, whether of the American, British, or some other type, all loosely referred to as "democracy"; and popular education, which, together with a free press, is democracy's chief support, its defender, and its voice.

The institution which proclaims mankind's greatest failure is war. Wars, which must be fought by the common man, are not his deliberate creation. To the prevention of wars, and the promotion of stable peace, the common man, who fights all wars, has contributed little. He has contributed little because the institutions of popular government and education have been isolated from world affairs. The common man—you and I and our neighbors—has not deliberately started any war, but once each generation he is called upon to fight one, and when it is over other people and other forces take control, and the common man retires from the place which only war gives him in world affairs, to wait until policies not of his making again require his presence in the camp and on the battlefields.

There are few problems of a public nature, no matter how urgent and grave, that may not be submitted, at least for good advice, to American public opinion, if the public is informed of the facts, free to discuss them, and free to express conclusions. This assumption underlies our form of government, and the institutions it supports. There is perhaps no influence in the world today more powerful than American public opinion, when based on full information and discussion. This influence, informed and free, is the only one of which you and I may be a part in fashioning world affairs. With it to rely upon, Government officials can make their final decisions with assurance that the policies they adopt will bind the Nation together rather than divide it.

History repeats itself, but only if left alone. History will repeat itself in world affairs, if left alone, and war will follow war, as it has always done. But man, by the power of public opinion, can intervene and, although success is not guaranteed, the effort should be worth making.

How can we have an informed and free public opinion on the difficult problems of world affairs? Newspapers, magazines, and books provide much material, of course, and help greatly to make public opinion. But even though everyone reads everything written on world affairs, this will not result in the understanding necessary to sound conclusions on general policies, or to any conclusion at all that can be called the conclusion of public opinion.

We can have an informed and free public opinion on this complicated subject only if we have adequate information in useful form, and opportunity for its full and open discussion. This, I believe, is a job for the universities, and for other groups that will work with them. The great special task of the next few months and years—is that of obtaining and keeping just, stable, and effective international relations, or, in the alternative, of providing all-powerful military and naval forces which will for a time protect, then bankrupt, and then rule the world.

What I want to say this evening, therefore, is based on confidence in the traditions of popular government, and the resourcefulness of education; and on the assumptions I have made—that American public opinion is a necessary element in the stabilization of world affairs, and that this opinion needs information, and opportunity for examination and criticism of proposed policies before they are adopted, and that the universities, and university men and women, should accept a major obligation in this regard.

Now, when we seem to be nearing the final months of our third war in less than half a century, it is time for all of us to re-examine the position of the United States in world affairs. I hope this examination will bring disagreement and discussion, for otherwise it will indicate apathy. We are probably a good deal divided in our thinking on these matters, and our conclusions are apt to be casual, emotional, or traditional. Our interest must not wait too long on future events, but must implement them, and not next year, but soon, even now. For it seems likely that educational institutions have not done all they could have done in this field, or all they ought to have done. Politicians are uncertain of the public mind, and I doubt whether we as a people are much better prepared for the urgent decisions of peace than we were in 1918.

Forces which determine international relationships are varied and subtle. Wars are not caused by some single event, such as the assassination of an archduke. An incident may determine the hour for a declaration of war, but its absence is not likely to deter for long the final event. But a decision for war is the culmination and combination of many things—political ambitions and personalities, difference in language, race, religion; social and economic theories; immigration and boundaries; economics, social conditions, industrial relations; foreign policies and law. These and other elements make up the mixture which stews through years of uneasy calm and finally explodes into war. They combine with each other; some are technical, some ethical, some more emotional than real. But they have one thing in common, as other problems are apt to have, they can usually be solved by something better than force, in this case, better than war. Usually, but perhaps not always, since few people still believe that the possibility of war can be finally eliminated, or that we should abandon our defenses against that possibility.

Because we realize more clearly than we used to the existence of these problems and their complexity, perhaps the opportunity of finding solutions was never better than today.

Is public opinion convinced that world affairs can be governed by law? Certainly, this is the hope of most of us, but hardly yet everyone's conviction. National pride, traditions of sovereignty, the possession of or desire for natural resources, linguistic barriers, are all among the obstacles, fancied or real. And yet, there is no convincing reason why disputes between nations, like disputes between individuals, cannot be regulated by a system of universal international law. People say that history proves that international law cannot be an effective guaranty of peace. History once proved, in the same way, that disputes between individuals could be resolved best by personal conflict. The Normans introduced into England a form of trial known as trial by battle.

"The defendant used it to establish his innocence when charged with crime, and plaintiffs used it to recover land, or chattels, or a debt. Witnesses could be required to fight a duel to establish their veracity." [2]

The speaker at these exercises on June 3, Chancelor Alfred B. Butts, spoke to you of the futility of wars, comparing private dueling, once an accepted and honorable means of settling personal disagreements, now a criminal offense. Dr. Butts urged the establishment of international courts, into which disputing nations should be required to come for an adjudication of their rights, instead of resorting to war. And this analogy between private duels and international wars is a good one, for in the perspective of history, dueling is a recent institution, so recent that both the present constitution of Alabama and the statutes of the State contain specific prohibitions against it. So here the lesson of history may be quite a different one than has usually been supposed. The lesson is not that law cannot supersede force in the affairs of nations, but rather that it has largely done so in the affairs of individuals; and there seems to be no logical or practical obstacle to such a result in international disputes.

It is common to talk of international law as though it exists only in books. Is it simply some dim dream, an academic theory, hardly worth the consideration of practical minds? On the contrary, it has had a real existence, although limited in scope, for a long time. It tends to break down during war, because war is usually the negation of law; but the conduct of war is to some extent subject to it, and even the Japanese have at times recognized it by protests that they had not violated it. As to its appeal to practical minds, the American Bar Association represents such a group, and that organization is definitely committed to furthering the development of international law, and making it the instrument for peace.

On many subjects there has been true and effective international legislation; that is, there have been multipartite international agreements or treaties having the force of law. Slavery, the opium traffic, and other abuses, have all been more or less successfully restrained by international legislation. The Hague conventions and the Covenant of the League of Nations mark steps in its development and recognition. But to have the support of the American public, the American public must know something about it, and must be convinced of its justice, of its impartiality, of its proper administration.

International law, based on popular understanding and support, can surely be a practical instrument for peace. International law, based on selfish objectives, conceived entirely in the minds of professional diplomats—its origins and purposes concealed from the common man, is not likely to succeed. Popular government and education must help create it, or the American public may not accept it, or expect other nations to abide by it.

The fifth article of the declaration on a just peace, made public in October 1943, signed by prominent Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish religious leaders and laymen, states:

"5. INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTIONS TO MAINTAIN PEACE WITH JUSTICE MUST BE ORGANIZED

"An enduring peace requires the organization of international institutions which will

(a) develop a body of international law, (b) guarantee the faithful fulfillment of international obligations, (c) assure collective security by drastic limitation and continuing control of armaments, compulsory arbitration and adjudication of controversies, and the use when necessary of adequate sanctions to enforce the law."

What is the role of force in international affairs? The choice, now being debated, between the use of force in the administration of international affairs, or their settlement by mutual understanding, seems to me to offer a false alternative. The real choice is between control by law or repudiation of law. In any case there will be force. Without force in the background there can be no effective law. It is true that as civilization progresses the force that is behind all law retires so far into the background that we may forget its existence. Why do we stop at traffic lights? If we don't we are likely to get into trouble—to meet force. Substantial compliance with domestic laws is not probable unless there are penalties for their breach. The issue is between international law backed by force and force without law. So the writer of an editorial in the Birmingham News for August 13, 1944, quotes Dorothy Thompson as follows:

"Peace cannot be enforced. Only justice and law can be enforced. The enforcement of anything—even peace—except under law, is war."

To the same effect are paragraphs No. (4) and (5) of Senate Resolution 114, submitted in March 1943 by Senators BALL, HILL, BURTON, and HATCH. These paragraphs provide for the establishment of procedures and machinery for peaceful settlement of disputes and disagreements between nations and "for the assembly and maintenance of a United Nations military force and to suppress by the immediate use of such force any future attempt at military aggression by any nation."

Can there be an effective and lasting world organization based on international collaboration and understanding? Those who doubt the practicability of an effective world organization for peace, relying solely on the history of the past 25 years, can often get the better of the argument. They usually cite the evasiveness of the great powers in applying the sanctions of the Treaty of Versailles, particularly in connection with Japan's entry into Manchuria and Italy's Ethiopian war, and the ineffectiveness of the Pact of Paris—the Kellogg-Briand Pact—of 1928, outlawing war as an instrument of national policy.

But with all this history of failure fresh in our memories, the almost complete unanimity of feeling that there must be a world organization to solve international problems and prevent war, shows at least the persistency of that idea.

In the recent book called The International Law of the Future, published under the auspices of the American Bar Association, the authors elaborate a proposal for the organization of the community of states:

"The community of states should be organized on a universal basis. All states which exist or which may come into existence in the future should be included. No provision should be made for the expulsion or withdrawal of any state."

Further on, commenting on the proposal that the Permanent Court of International Justice should be maintained as the chief judicial organ of the community of states, is this statement:

"A generation of effort triumphed in the establishment of the Permanent Court of International Justice. Fifty-two states have given their formal support to the maintenance of the Court, and practically all the states of the world—including all the states of the Western Hemisphere—have become parties to instruments which give it jurisdiction. More than 500 treaties have been concluded which relate to the Court, and many of them continue in force" (p. 102).

I have examined many newspapers and popular magazines in addition to professional material dealing with the matter of a world organization of states. Expressions of opinion in popular magazines and newspapers are likely to have as much significance, or more, than the views of technicians and experts. In an editorial signed by Paul Hunter in Liberty for August 26, 1944, hope for a long peace is justified, the writer concludes:

"Bellicose nations will think twice in the future before starting wars in which we might be involved.

"This does not mean that America needs no international organization to preserve peace. We need it, and the rest of the world needs it. Tranquillity can come only under a code of international law. An organization is needed to create this law and to enforce it."

Newspapers again and again repeat the same idea—there must be a world organization to preserve peace under law and to prevent war.

But the forms which this could take, and there are at least a dozen, and the reaction of the public to one or more of these possible forms, are still at best uncertain.[3] If experts work out a paper scheme that does not have the understanding and support of the common man, of American public opinion, the chances of its success are not good. There must be understanding between the nations, and there must be understanding within our own Nation. American public opinion must support the idea of world organization, and it must be sold on the merit of a particular plan. Popular government and education are the basis on which world peace and world order must be built, at least insofar as American participation is concerned.

What is the relationship between world affairs and domestic affairs?

The seventh paragraph of the declaration on a just peace, referred to before, signed by the religious and lay representatives of the Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish churches, states:

"A JUST SOCIAL ORDER WITHIN EACH STATE MUST BE ACHIEVED

"Since the harmony and well-being of the world community are intimately bound up with the internal equilibrium and social order of the individual States, steps must be taken to provide for the security of the family, the collaboration of all groups and classes in the interest of the common good, a standard of living adequate for self-development and family life, decent conditions of work, and participation by labor in decisions affecting its welfare."

Mr. Robert J. Watt, writing of the International Labor Conference held in May 1944, at Philadelphia, expresses the same view:

"An enduring peace [can] only be based on social justice.

* * * * * *

"We know that a world which is half slave and half free will never be a peaceful world."

Whatever the relationship between our own domestic affairs, world affairs, and international peace, whatever solutions must finally be made of some of those problems, if these solutions are to stick, if they are to be practical solutions, American public opinion must be informed about them, fully and with candor. Popular government, and an informed and free American public opinion are elements without which permanent solutions cannot be made.

These and other problems of international law and world affairs, press for wise answers, not too long delayed. They are not new, but we are approaching them today with a new spirit, with new knowledge and responsibility, with a belief that peace and world prosperity are worth working for, and the hope that they are attainable.

American public opinion, aided by a free press and by educational institutions, must be a chief factor in ultimate results. In that sense, we must make and keep a people's peace. You who are leaving the university must keep your interest keen, your minds open, and, in such ways as you can, become a part of public opinion. We who remain here must cultivate each opportunity to the same ends, by institutes, classes, and frequent discussion, in the conviction that the world is now indeed one world, and the people of the world must finally become, in interest and understanding, one people.
